And for that the said resident afterwards toucheth in the said memorial, that it may not be allowed, that the subjects of England should enter in suit with those of Flanders, but only address themselves to their high mightinesses, and after proof of the fact, that their ships taken by the Flemings have been sold in these countries, to expect of their high mightinesses due reparation and satisfaction; the Sieurs d'Ommeren, and other deputies of their high mightinesses for the affairs of England, are required to represent to the said Sieur resident, that all the affairs touching prizes and merchandizes, which are brought into the ports of this state, and demanded by their owners, acknowledge no other judicature and jurisdiction, than those of the respective admiralties privately, and it is before them, that, according to the placarts, affairs of this kind, with all circumstances concerning the same, must be discussed and decided, as is usual in all other countries of Europe.

Europe. The said deputies are also required hereby to be instant with the said Sieur resident, that the Portugal sugar prizes taken by the men of war of this state, and arrested in England, may be presently released. A.D. 1658.

Secret resolution touching the assisting of the elector of Brandenburg.

THE states general of the United Provinces having seriously examined and weighed the contents of a certain memorial of the eleventh instant, presented to their high mightinesses by the ministers of the elector of Brandenburg; also heard the report of the Sieurs Ommeren and other deputies of their high mightinesses, that had a conference with the said ministers touching what farther resolution this state shall take in the present conjuncture of affairs, in regard of the attempts of the Swedes on the kingdom of Denmark, they have, after mature deliberation, found it good to give to the said ministers this answer to their said memorial; that their high mightinesses have lately signified to the lieutenant-admiral Opdam, that over and above what he hath already in charge, that it is also their desire, that first the Swedish forces, that are at present in the isle of Zeland, may be hindered from being transported into Holstein or Jutland, and from joining with the forces of the prince of Sultzbach. Secondly, if the elector of Brandenburg shall desire, that any part of his army, for the relief of the king of Denmark, should be transported into Zeland, or into any other island of Denmark, that, in behalf of this state, all possible ways and means may be used to facilitate such his intention; that, in order hereunto, he the said lieutenant-admiral shall, instead of lying with his fleet in and about the Sound, or about the kingdoms of Denmark and Norway, keep himself and fleet in and about the Great Belt, and there, all together, or divided in squadrons, to watch and do what may be done to hinder the joining of the Swedish armies. And in case the said elector of Brandenburg should be inclined to transport a part of his army as aforesaid, that he the said lieutenant-admiral, in such case, for the facilitating of the same, shall not only make use of his fleet, but is hereby farther authorized, for the transportation of the said Brandenburg soldiers, to press and take all ships, as well of this nation as other nations, that shall be found thereabouts, with promise and assurance, that for the same they shall receive the ordinary freight; that he the said admiral shall hold correspondence with the said elector, and with the Sieur Isbrants there, ambassador for this state, their high mightinesses having to this end, by letters to the said Sieur Isbrants, given order to signify the same to the said elector, with desire, that his electoral highness would speedily make known his intention to their high mightinesses directly, and also to the said lieutenant-admiral, always understood, that the said lieutenant-admiral should have before his eyes the executing of his former instructions, according to the good intent and meaning of their high mightinesses, in case that the king of Denmark should please (after communication thereof unto him) to give order accordingly. And although the said king should not be in condition to receive such communication, and to give such order, or that it could not be done without considerable loss of time, that he the said lieutenant-admiral shall speedily put in execution these things. That their high mightinesses have resolved in behalf of this state, to dispatch away a minister to the great duke of Muscovy; and that the council of state of the United Provinces is desired to provide the said electoral highness with a considerable quantity of powder and match, at such a price as hath been agreed before between the said elector's ministers and this state, with promise, that the same, in a certain short time, shall be ratified by the said elector; their high mightinesses desiring the forementioned ministers to make a favourable report of this their friendly and neighbourly order, or else, on the first opportunity, to write to the said elector, assuring him, that their high mightinesses are resolved to continue in their affection and inclination for holding and maintaining all good correspondency and preservation of the common interests, and to testify the same really and effectually in the present troubles of the king and crown of Denmark, caused by the unexpected invasion of Zeland by the king of Sweden; and thereunto his electoral highness may be pleased to give all credit. Given at the assembly of the states general at the Hague, 2. Nov. 1658. [N. S.]

Therfor I shall say no more, but to assure you, that I am

Your affectionate frend, and very humble servant,

Wimbleton, the 23. of October, [1658.]

J. LAMBERT.

To general Fleetwood.

May it please your LORDSHIP,

In the possession of the editor.

I AME very sensible, that the multiplicity of your perplexinge affaires will hardly give way to your deliberate readinge and weighinge soe (seemingly) tedious ane addresse, especially beinge joyned with the consideration of my beinge such an inferiour and inconsiderable person, (as indeed I ame) and cominge upon ane errand, that imports soe litle in a way of fellowship with the multitude of addressees and inteligences, that from the quarters round about (it seems) are by compliers with the times sent unto you, while multitudes of the Lord's people are mourninge before him in the greife of their soules, to observe the holy name, workes, wayes, and people of the Lord, that were somtimes said to be your strength in the Lord of hosts your God, to be now (to say noe worse) soe lightly sett by. Neither ame I altogether unacquainted with the deare-bought experience, that some have had of that word, that when truth faileth, they that depart from inequity make themselves a prey, but have (it may be to carnally) too often been reasoninge myselfe into an unbeleevinge silence, because it is an evill time, when to have been valeant for the truth had better suited with a spiritt, that hath with you rejoyced in the Lord, to see heertofore the righteousness of our kinge before him, and settinge his people in the way of his steppes, both in camp and councill, by land and sea; remembringe alsoe the disadvantages on my hand of a written rather then a verball testimony, as it may be construed and improved; yet callinge to minde the former tests I have had off, and acquaintance with your spiritts, and knowinge, that in the Lord's account, he that dealeth plainlye, is worthy of more favour, then he that flattereth with his lipps, beinge thereunto alsoe prest with paine night and day beyond a possibillity of containinge, I have adventerred on your wonted ingenuity and piety, withall letinge you know, that in case I find not its exercise to me ward, but that the same measure be meted out to me, as hath been to others, yet through grace I have reconed the cost, and shall cast all the carefull burden upon the Lord, to dispose of me and of this, as it seemeth good in his sight. Neither doe I beg the exercise of any charitie in this, further then the truth of it deserveth, save only I desire you to take knowledge of it, and looke on it, not as the hasty offspringe of a disturbed mind, or a matter animated by any malignant influence from others judged factious and seditious, but indeed the consequent, and, I judge, the answer of many prayers to the Lord, after I had turned every stone, and used all maner of arguments with myselfe, to banish and smother it, and beinge the only way with me, if not effectually to remember you of that from whence you are fallen, and to provoke you to doe your first worke, yet to keep myselfe pure, and by this weak and plaine testimony to give you to know, that through grace I am cleer in this matter. My lord, the imediate occasion of my now writeinge is from the vew of the late addresse, that (it's said) was presented by your lordship to the protector you have now advanced, as alsoe from the sight of another like unto it presented by the officers of the navy, the former of which is don in the name of the army, of which I am hitherto accounted a member (though a weake one); and considred in that capacity, I apprehend, that my full consent is implicitly signified, and would by my silence be ratified; the maine scope of it beinge to strengthen the hands of a single person, his aiders and abettors, in his cominge in upon the office of cheife magistrate of these nations, which is in the said addresse endeavoured partly by many flateries (unto which, I may say, mine honor, be not thou united) as alsoe by a tender made of all constant and faithfull obedience to him, as rightfully advanced to that supream magistracie, and (as the saylors are bid to say in their addresse, which is of the same complexion and fellowship) with the uttmost hazard of their lives to stand against all those, who shall endeavour to restore the late commonwealth, and against all other opposers of this thinge whatsoever.

My lord, may I deale plainly with your lordship? I ame utterly at a losse in the exercise of all my observation and judgment, if those instruments, togeather with the whole series of transactions now in your high places, doe not proceed in a path directly crosse and opposite to the plaine intendment and true spiritt, that ran through those many declarations, tions, engagements, and other publique edicts, that proceeded from and by meanes of us, A.D. 1658. and began to be prosecuted by us in the day of our virginity, which are well knowne to you, and therefore need not to be inserted in perticular, being manifest in the vew of the sun, unto which we were led by the stretched out hand of the Lord in such cleernesse of light, satisfaction, and singleness of spirit, witnessed unto by such a constant blessing of the Lord in all undertakings; desired and rejoyced in by the most upright and thorough spirits for God in the land; made terrible to all ungodly persons, and antichristian and unrighteous constitutions both in church and state, as became famous not only in these nations, but in all the nations round aboute.

My lord, I must professe, that in my remembrance (in the feare of God) of my having been led into, and persuance of, this cause, and those engagements through many wounds, imprisonments, and other hardships and hazards, as alsoe how much blood I personally shed, and to how much more I am espoused in the common cause, the guilt wherof will lye at my door in my turninge from the righteous cause, for which it was shed, and beinge in full assurance of the presence of God with me all along therin, I am firme through grace united to that blessed cause, as farr as it was carryed on with truth and uprightness, and trust to give a lodging to it in my heart, though it should be deserted of its old friends, and I should be reduced to a morsell of bread for its sake, it beinge to me as deare and as good as ever. Neither can I thinke what evill it hath don, or what malignity was found in it, either in the theorie or practise of it, that it should not only be thought worthy to receive that unexpected interruption, and its best friends that sad discountenance, that for some few late years it hath don; but that now alsoe there should be expected, if not imposed, ane engagement to oppose any endeavours for it with the utmost hazard of our lives to support somthinge in opposition to it against all opposers whatsoever, how righteous or sutable to the minde or dispensations of God soever. Neither can I yett beleieve, that the end of the Lord in drawinge out so largely the blood, treasure, teares and faith of his people in expectation of glorious deliverance to them, and honour to Christ in the earth, (besides the blood and estates of many thousands else by land and sea) was levelled only unto, and to be resolved into that, which is now sett up as the crowninge mercie to this poor (or to the righteous) nation, especially when, to the best of my understandinge, it hath been judged in parliament, even when they were under the highest anoyntings to consult and administer judgment and righteousness, "that to have the power of these nations in any single person is unnecessary, burdensome, and dangerous to the liberty, safety, and publique interest of the people, and that for the most part use hath been made of the regall power and prerogative to oppresse, impoverish, and enslave the nation; and that usually and naturally any one person in such power makes it his interest to encroach upon the just freedom and liberties of the people, and to promote the setting up of their own will and power above the lawes, &c." Moreover, what eye seeth not (what gracious eye weepeth not to see!) what sad groans of oppression and miserie are every-where in the nation! what liftinge up there is of the head and horne of the wicked! what rebukes from the Lord have been and yet remaine unheeded upon the persons and proceedinges aimeinge to uphold the present enterprizes you are upon! what courtinge and espousinge of men and thinges, which were formerly judged the abomination of the Lord, with whome he had stated and pleaded his controverisie! how much the hearts of the righteous are made sad, as well by the insultings of the vilest men over them, as by the utter disappoyntinge of all their hopefull expectations this way! If you see not these thinges, the Lord helpe you to harken after them, and lay them to heart!

Upon the whole, haveinge been thus farr plaine with your lordship in the discharge of my conscience, it may be you will judge me ane instrument unfitt for the imployment I am in, if your aimes be to prosecute a designe of worldly greatnes and honour, in neglect of the true intrest and cause of the best people in the nation. However, I hope the Lord will deliver me from the flattery of the times, and from lyeinge open to any compliance, wherby my conscience should be wrested from the simplicity, that it longs to preserve in this matter. And for the trust hitherto reposed in me, I hope it can be made evident, that I have not failed to approve myself diligent to the uttermost of my abillitye, and, through the blood of the Lamb, shall have comfort and boldnes in the day of judgment, that in the midst of many infirmities the Lord hath enabled me to be faithfull to the true intrest of his name and people; nay, however this very addresse may be interpreted now, yet one day it will be found (though weake, yet) a true testimony of my love to you, and greife for you; and however you shall thinke fitt to dispose of me, yet I shall labour to approve myself (in my desires, that you and others may be pluckt out of the snare) one of General Fleetwood to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

DEARE BROTHER,

YOU are pleased by your last to expresse your desires of coming into England, and that it lay in my power to remove any obstruction, which might stande in the way therunto. I know not what that may meane. I hope you doe not think ther is any thing but the publicke occasions, which detaines you; neither doe I think them to be so pressing, as to necessitate your longe absence from the neare and deare relations you desire to see; but the great designs and endeavours of our old enemy to put things into blood, and to embroyle the nations in troubles, is a thing, which hath bine in exception against you presant coming, especially considering, when the parliament comes, how many humours will then be working, whearin Ireland will be concerned, as well as the other two nations; and that which is sayde besides is this, that it's very doubtfull, what condicion you can put Ireland in, when you are absent, to preserve its peace and security from attempts abroad or at home, this being fit to know your judgment, befor any thing be concluded heere. We are under much difficulty as to the buyfnes of the Sound, the Sweade being assaulted by the Dutch at sea, and the Brandenburgs, Poles, and Austrian forces. The difficulty with us is the Hollanders interposing on the Danes behalfe. How farre we shall be engaged in that affayre, wherin they mak themselves a party, makes it hard to us. But I hope the Lord will direct; for I am sure England is deeply concerned in that buyfnes: so is the whole Protestant party; for if thos Popish princes get the power of the Balticke sea on on side, and the Dutch the Sound, I feare what the issue may be. It's very desirable wee and the Dutch should keep freinds; but I would be loath they should be befor-hande with us in getting possession of the Sound. I am

Mr. S. Disbrowe, one of the council of Scotland, to the protector Richard.

May it please your HIGHNESS,

INTIMATION hath been lately given to your highnes councill heere by their agent Vol. lxi. p. 392. at London, that some persons of this nation are petitioning your highness, that they may be appointed and added to those already commissioned to be commissaryes of Edinburgh; and therefore your highnesse councill heere should it their dutyes, humbly to acquaint your highnes, that although before the English authority took place heere, there were fowre commissaryes of Edinburgh, they being advocats or country gentlemen, some of whome attending that service in their turnes, it became the more easie unto them; which fowre commissaryes had three of them the yearly fallary of 500 markes Scots apeece, and the eldest commissary 600 markes Scots, which (if it had been so settled before) must have been paid out of your highnes exchequer here; for those officers, besides the other profits belonging thereunto. Your highnesse councill here, upon their first settling of the inferior judicatures in this nation, considered therein the ease of the publique charge throughout, and (upon that consideration) found cause to appoint only two commissaryes of Edinburgh and Haddingtonshire, and appointed one (for the ease of the people) in the shire of Linlithgow, which shire did formerly belong to the commissariat of Edinburgh, which two persons are found by experience sufficient for that judicature, to whom noe fallaryes being continued, their fees and profits, though small and inconsiderable, might the better support them in the service, when noe more were to share therein; and accordingly your highnes said councill did give commission to two honest and able gentlemen, to wit, John Nisbett and Godfrey Rodes, esqrs. to be commissaryes of Edinburgh, who have for above three years past faithfully discharged their trusts therein with good satisfaction to your highnes councill and the people heere, as it is not doubted they will continue to doe. In regard whereof your highnes said councill in all humillity conceive, and offerr to your highness, that there is no need of more or other persons to join in that judicature, and that any addition therein would bee chargeable to the state, and perhaps tending to the renewing of fallaryes to the whole number, because of the smallnesse of the fees accruing to those offices, which could not in any sort answer the burden and quallity of those officers, in case there should be any greater number of them. All which, by appointment of your highnes councill heere, is humbly represented to your highnes by

A.D. 1658. MONSIEUR,

Vol. lxi. p. 389.

SAMÉDY passée l'on a arresté & finalement resolu d'envoyer encore 40 compagnies d'infanterie vers Dennemarc, ou bien au secours de ce roy, sans toutefois avoir nommé le jour pour le rendezvous.

Aussy l'Overyffel alors president n'a pas voulu conclure en cela : la Frise y a consenty, & l'a conclu, à condition qu'au lieu des envoyées l'on leur donne d'autres compagnies pour leur renfort. Le resident d'Angleterre a exhibé un memoire fort plaintive, ou plustot comminatoire, touchant les torts, qu'il dit qu'on fait aux navires Anglois, et que les admirautés ne font pas droit, & que cela ne peut plus subsister avec le paix : item, qu'il ne voudra plus avoir affaire avec les admirautés ; ains qu'il desire, que les estats generaux veuillent mettre ordre aux mêmes.

L'on a delibéré long temps sur le dit memoire du resident d'Angleterre, & la Hollande a fort mal prins le dit memoire, & les aigres expressions dans iceluy point convenables à l'amitié & bonne correspondance, & qui designent, que le dit resident n'entend pas, ou ne veut pas entendre, la forme de regime icy. L'Hollande spécialement aura dit, que cest estat ne veut ny ne doit donner la moindre occasion à une rupture ; mais si on ne s'en peut pas passer, l'Hollande monstrera autant de courage contre l'Angleterre, qu'aucune autre province. Mais estant embarrassée, qu'on doit un peu patir ou dissimuler, & on luy remonstrera par deputés, qu'il veuille avoir egard à la façon du regne, & qu'il faut laisser agir les admirautés.

L'on aura resolu de donner une responce aux ministres de Brandeburg sur leurs divers memoires, qui toutefois fera generale : le col. Pichler a laissé le gouvernement du fort de Schenk en main du capitaine Hettinga Frison, comme plus vieil capitaine. Mais la Geldre l'ayant donné au capitaine Bommel, Hettinga en a fait plainte aux estats generaux, qui provisionnellement maintiennent Hettinga. L'estat n'a nulles nouvelles de Dennemarc, ny de la flotte, ny s'il y a eu attaqué en bataille. Mais de Middelbourgh vient advis, qu'en Zeland seroit arrivé une galliotte, (autres disent un navire de Lubeck) disant, qu'il a vu les flottes ensemble en combat ; & qu'il les a ouy combattant, & les cannonades, sans autres particularités. Mais delà on conclude, qu'indubitablement on aura des particularités dans un jour ou deux.

La responce à donner aux ministres de Brandeburg sera maintenant achevée, mais point encore donnée. En quelle façon tel capitaine Ooms a esté en action avec les Anglois, se voit par la copie adjointe : l'on a resolu de faire de cela contre les plaintes des Anglois.

Les 40 compagnies, qui sont destinées vers Dennemarc, sont partagées à estre mis à Enchuyfen, à Horn, à Muyden, à Hardewyck, à Stavoren, & à Harlingen. Et d'autant que les amis du prince Guillaume luy dissuadent fort le voyage & employ vers Dennemarc, il y a apparence, que l'on ne l'offrira pas, car en le luy offrant il ne voudroit pas le refus. Maintenant on deliberera pour l'envoy d'un autre chef.

L'on a resolu de conceder à l'electeur de Brandenburg l'envoy d'une bonne quantité de poudre, dont se passera une obligation à le rendre dans quelques temps. Ce subside l'on trouve plus expedit & prompt, que de promettre de l'argent ; car pour de l'argent, il faudroit du consentement des provinces, qui dureroit long temps devant qu'il puisse venir.

L'electeur de Brandenburg aura resolu d'envoyer le sieur Weyman vers Angleterre pour solliciter le protecteur à estre du party de Dennemarc ; & derechef cest estat a promis d'envoyer vers le grand ksar de Muscovie pour se faire estre ou demeurer du même party.

L'on a esté eu conference avec le sieur Downing, & on luy a representé la constitution du droit & coustumes de cest estat, que toutes choses de la marine se decident par les admirautés, & que ce n'est pas en la puissance des estats generaux de changer cela pour rien, ny pour personne. Sur cela le sieur Downing a donné des parolles plus douces, & n'a pas parlé la language, qu'il avoit tenu dans son memoire ; parloit beaucoup du commun interest, d'amitié, & de correspondance, qui devoit estre entre le protecteur & cest estat.

L'on a resolu sur la marine de faire emaner quelque nouveau placart, ou bien une renovation de celui du huitième Aoust dernier. Le memoire touchant le navire de Lubeck est mis en mains de l'admirauté de Rotterdam.

L'on consenti d'envoyer soixante officiers en Norvege au fraix & gages de cest estat.

L'ambassadeur d'Espagne a notifié avec estats generaux, qu'il va vers la Brabande pour 15 jours, recommandant une vielle affaire d'un navire prins autrefois par ceux de la compagnie de West-Inde. Le sieur Huygens va le complimenter, & luy souhaiter bon voyage.

L'admiral escrit, qu'il estoit le 29. Octobre sous le Vierboet de Schagen, luy ayant esté impossible jusques alors de monter contre ce courant de l'eau ; que le roy de Suede l'attendoit à Croneberch avec 36 navires. L'admiral avec de Witt & les navires de Zelande estoit fort de 35 navires & 6 fluytes.

Le sieur Nieupoort a escrit, qu'il desiroit venir icy ; mais on a escrit, qu'il ne vienne pas.

On

On a donné une réponse ou résolution au sieur Downing sur sa dernière mémoire. A.D. 1658.
 On delibere encore sur la façon des 40 compagnies, & sur les 60 officiers, qui seront envoyés vers Norveege. Je reste

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

I AM heartily sorry, that your indisposition of health continues so long upon you. I hope, that the sickly season of the yeare being over, your health will returne, of which I am sure there is very great neede. I received by this last post a letter from Mr. Moreland, together with the papers concerning the East-Indy ships taken at Bantam; and I shall be most ready to doe my utmost therein, and am very glad, that the councill have resolved upon that way of ^{speaking with the states general} 144 426 197 339 55 500 468 533 ^{about them,} seriously 182 468 103, which also accords with what I hinted to you as my simple opinion in my last; and I doubt not, but you will think it necessary to take the same course about the bringing in, selling, and disposing of English shipping heere by these of Flanders before, and without any sentence of any court of admiralty, which is no other than a plaine, downright, and desperate sea robbery. Yesterday the states general desired from me a conference with their deputies about my memoriall, which I sent you the last weeke. I told them plainly, that this was a course and practice, that could not be longer suffered by his highness, it being so contrary to comon right, and all good amity, and so destructive to his subjects, a thing never before in this manner practised in any nation; and that his highnes hath not any one instance to make of the like done to him by any other of his friends or allies; and in fine, that this practise continueing, it's but a half peace, to wit, only between England and the United Provinces, but not between the United Provinces and England, England being bound, and they free, they enjoying perfect peace in all the havens of England, and the English from day to day undone in the havens of the United Provinces. They desired me to explaine that clause of my said memoriall, wherein I had said, that his highness's subjects could not begin any processees with those of Flanders, but singly and solely apply themselves to the states, and not, as in matters meerly private, begin their processe before the admiralties, or any other courts, and acquiesce in their sentence; but complaint being made to the states, it was for them as they see good to referr the matter to the admiralties, or elsewhere; against which I had nothing to say, and it being indifferent to us where the examination of the matter were, so it were by their order, and that his highness's subjects not haveing right there done unto them, must returne againe to the states generall, and from them expect reparation; against which they said they had nothing to except. Withall I told them, that the truth was, I had very small reason to be satisfied with the referring matters of this nature to the admiralties; for that notwithstanding the many references made by the states to them, with order, that in case they found the matter of fact, true restitution should be made, yet not any one ship had to this day bin restored by them to the English, although the matter of fact had bin most clearly proved, as may appear from time to time by their owne registers, and particularly in the case complained of in my said memoriall. I have heerein inclosed to you the paper, which they put into my hands, and they gave me many good words; and that they were putting out a new placart, which, they said, they would pass yesterday. I told them, that if this new placart proved of noe purpose, and that his highnes did not in this business found his complaints upon any of their placarts, but upon common right, and the law of nations. In conclusion, they spoke to me again about the two Portugal prises. To which I replied, that I perceived they were very zealous in any thing, wherein themselves were concerned; but who should make reparation for the many scores of English shipping brought into their havens by them of Flanders, and there unjustly, and contrary to all right, unladen, sold, and disposed of? And farther, that what was done to those Portugall prises, was by order of the admiralty, to which all shipping are subject, according to the 19. article of the treaty of peace between England and the United Provinces. And whereas they said, that by the laws heere, in such case as that, the prises ought to have bin suffered to have come hither, and such as had pretended any interest in them, heere to have commenced their processe. I replied, that by the said 19. article, in each comonwealth processe was to be made according to its owne lawes, and not according to the lawes of the other; and that I made noe doubt, but that they would finde, that the admiralty at London hath in this business proceeded according to the lawes and customes of England; and therefore that they had noe reason of complaint. But that in the case I had soe often complained, and what was done, was done against undoubted knowne

A.D. 1658. common right, which also by the 24. article of the treaty of peace, ought to be enjoyed by us, and against many lawes, placarts, and orders of this state; and this all acknowledged by themselves; and therefore that I did earnestly press them, that at last this piraticall practise may be effectually remeadyed. Not more, but that I am,

Dunkerke, Novem. 8th 1658 N. S.

Vol. lxi. p. 407. SO soone as I past Gravelinge yesterday, I was mett by some of our horse from Dunkerke, who brought me the ill news of their having been a mutiny in the garrison the day before. It was made by the foote; those of my own regiment was rather more then less ingadged then others; they called out to armes, plundred the mercatts and some shopps. The horse mounted immediately upon it, and cleared the streets; so that by them, and some of the foot-officers, amongst whom captain Wisdome in coll. Salmond's regiment did very honestly and boldly act his part, the business was almost as soone quashed, as it had a beginning; but the souldiers continued still in their ill humours, and some of them talked a little insolently yesterday; but upon my arrivall towards the evening, I found all (save those that were upon guard) in the streets without armes, and was wellcomed by them in their accustomed way of shouting, and in so chearfull and hartie a manner, as I was almost perswaded, that all I had been told was mistake; but having afterward spoake with coll. Alsopp, and some other of the officers, I found all was too trew. I enquired, what justice had been done, and found the court martiall had mett, examined some witnesses, but forbore to proceed to sentence; which occasioned me to appoint a court martiall this morning, and having exhorted some of the chiefe officers to try them upon the trew article, he that officiated as judge-advocate, brings me word, there are foure of them condemned this morning. I shall see their sentence executed upon some of them, and if I finde any so penitent, as he will ingeniously declare, where the business had its ryse, I shall mixe mercy with justice. The pretence of this mutiny was, because their pay was not reddy the very day it was deu; but I am perswaded there is something else at bottom of it, and I hope to finde it out. But, my lord, tho' thorough the Lord's assistance, I shall endeavour to see this offence severly punished, yet I shall never be able to carry on the affaires of this garrison, unless I have a considerable supply of money sent me from England; and indeed the horse, who are sufferers beyond the foot exceedingly, did behave themselves so faithfully, as I must begg, that some speedy course may be taken for their incuradgment. I shall now begin to apply myself to the business of contribution, and shall be as active about it as I can; but any money, that can be raised that way, will not answer our present necessities; and therefore I must againe beseech your lordship, so to represent our conditione heare to his highness and councell, as also some money may be sent over; and I hope your lordship will perswade yourself, and assure his highness, that if I knew any way in the world how to shift, I would not at so unseasonable a time, when his highness is under so many pressures, importune him for more. The customes of this last month have been scarce worth the collectione; but they make me beleeve, that there will be a more considerable sum raised out of them in the two ensuing months, then in any other 4 months of the yeare. Besyds, I hope to rayse out of the contribution that, which will help the garrison to subsist a part of the winter; so that if I had a somme of money to answer our present necessities, I shall endeavour, that this place be not much more troublesome to his highness till towards the spring.

My lord, I finde a vessell loaden from Croninsburgh and Dantzick brought in here by one captain Welsh, who, by virtew of a commission from the king of Swedden, claims her as his pryse. The business is intricate, and therefore I have ordered her being sent to London, that his highness may at least have the custome of her, and Welsh may justifie his pretensions to her before the admiralty there. Yesterday I received orders from the court concerning the winter-quarter of the regiments in the field. Amiens is the place appointed; but I fear Mr. Turenne may stop their march for some time, by reason the enemy begin to think of attempting the recoverie of some of the places they have lost this campagne. I have in this place about 500 of the sick and weake belonging to the regiments in the field. They have nothing to subsist upon, save as I am forced to lend them; and God knoweth how little I neede that additionall burthen. I have oftentimes impor-importuned your lordshipp for bedds, and sent in gowns. The weather now grows so cold heere, as there is trewlie a greater want of theis accomodations, then your lordshipp can imagine. I begg they may be sent over as soone as is possible. The poore sowles at Mardick and fort Oliver have nothing to cover them, nor to lye upon, save a few boards; and the horsemen, and a great many of the foot here, are in the same condition; and I am unwilling to remember your lordshipp of the great supplies were sent to Mardick last year, when they were very well, and punctually paid by the French besyds. And tho', I blefs God for it, I have always had more respect and kyndnesse from the officers and souldiers of this army, then I have merited; yet I feare they will at last think, that either my interest at home is not so good (as justlie it may be) as his was, who comanded before me, or otherwise my care of them, and dilligence for them, is not so great. When I consither how much all heere in generall, and above all myself in particular, are bound to your lordshipp for your care of us, and goodnesse towards us, I could wish I had other matter to entertain you with then these sadd storyes, which I know toucheth your lordshipp's heart as sensibly as they doe that of,

May it please your LORDSHIPP,

Your most humble, faithfull, and obedient servant,

WILL. LOCKHART.

Lord Broghill to secretary Thurloc.

DEARE SIR,

I AM now newly returned from waitinge on my lord deputy, who I found and left full of thoughts, by reason of some late tranfactons at London, and your silence thes three last posts. I dare say he is much troubled, that either affaires are such, as that you have noe comfort to write, or your indisposition such, as you have not strength to doe it. I blefs God we are all quiet heere, and I hope shall be soe, tho' there are discontented spirits amongst us, as well as in other places, tho' their teeth be not soe longe. God keepe you from divissions, lest it might let in the worst of enemies.

I send this only to inquire after your health, and to beg an accounte of it from any of your servants, if you are not in a condition to acquaint me with it yourselfe; for without compliment it is unfaynedly pretious and considerable unto, DEARE SIR,

Your most faithfull and most affectionate humble servant,

Ballemaloe, 29th of October, 58.

BROGHILL.

I must give you my most humble acknowledgements for your great favour to col. Viliers, who is also huge sensible of it.

Relation of the sea-fight betweene the Swedes and Dutch.

Helsingor, the 29th of October, 1658.

THIS day morning about 7 of the clocke, the Holland's fleete, which had layen here dayes, weighed anchor, and the winde blowing pretty hard from north north-west, they steered their course towards the castle, where, about 8 of the clocke, they came almost within cannon-shott, and feareing the reach thereof, they held the coast of Schonen. The foremost of their ships, makeing small sayle, stayed for the rest of the fleete, and being come up to them, divided themselves into fowre squadrons, and haveing a favourable winde, went by the castle, from whence they were first saluted with two pieces of cannon. The Swedish fleete in the meane while endeavoured to gaine upp to them, haveing but halfe a winde; whereupon a little after 8 the fight began in good earnest. His excellencie rix-admirall Wrangell was, for the space of halfe an howre, furrounded with six Holland shippes, but defended himselfe so valiantly, that they could not gett advantage of him; but being at last not a little dampnified, hee was forced to leave the ingagement, and bear upp towards the shore. During which action the rest of his majestie's fleete used their best endeavours, and it might easily appear, that, from the very first beginning, the Hollanders intended to avoyde the brunt of this incounter, and to save themselves by flight. It was indeed strange and wonderfull to behold, that when the Swedes strove to board the Hollanders, they presently fled, and gave place. In this dispute two only of the Swedish shippes, the Morning-star and Pellican, commanded by capt. Petter, an Englishman, are lost, one whereof is burnt. The Hollanders have in all lost 9 shippes, viz. Brederoda, which had the admirall Witte Wittefson on board; Breda, mounted with 28 gunns, another

A.D. 1658. another with 22, and another whereof wee cannot yet tell the name. Their admirall Witte Witteson was boarded by the Swedish admirall Bielkenstern, and, being quite spoyled, is brought upp hither to the brick-house. Two other shippes of theirs lye fast upon the ground of Schonen; one is burnt; one allsoe with a little galliott lyeth on the ground not farr from Weaven. If the winde had proved a little better for us, and not beene soe favourable for the Hollanders to make their escape, they would have had a hard bout of it, and perhaps not many beene saved. God be praised for this gallant victory, which it hath pleased him to give his majestie of Sweden! None of his majesties men of warre being as yet come to shore, and they lyeing at a good distance one from another, it cannot as yet certainly be knowne, what men are lost. The Swedish admirall Girtson Scakelm is wounded in the shoulder with a musquett shott, but without any danger of his life: collonel Ferson is likewise razed with a bullett on the head, but not mortally; and we cannot as yet heare, that any person of quality besides should be lost. It is said, that the Hollanders admirall Opdam hath layen sicke some dayes on shippe board, whether he be alive, or what is become of him, is not yet knowne. The admirall Witte Witteson, being brought on board of the Swedish admirall Bielkenstern dyed there of a shott in the thygh: his shipp funke this afternoone about three of the clocke, from which 210 prisoners were brought hither, 100 of the same shipp were killed, and sixty maymed. His excellencie the rix-admirall of Sweden hath already repaired the leakes of his shippe, and lyeth now with the fleete giving every-where good order for the venturing another blow with the Dutch, and his majestie himselfe is gone towards the Leazure. Although so great a noyse hath beene hitherto made of this Holland fleete, yet wee could see nothing else dureing the engagement of three houres, but that they all strove to save themselves by flight; and whilst the fight lasted, their merchant-men past through the Sownd betweene Weanen and Schonen.

THE states of Holland not being together, here is very little stirring of moment; nor is there yet at all any newes concerning the fleete, upon which all mens eyes are at present, it being now agreed by all, that the king of Sweden will fight them, having together his whole navall force, (not one ship excepted) and trusting much upon the place, in which he hath scituated himself, and the assistance, which he shall have from the castles of Elsignore and Elsinburg; and there is much talke of this supply yet well into Copenhagen of sending more, and beseidging Croningsburg castle; and that 492 72 149 140 319 82 shall be put into the hand of the stat. gen. 231 468 107 71 146 144 319 86 231 434 332 477 468 319 89 32 140 408 468 not be good for England. The last newes from admirall Updam was of the 29th of October, neare Schaeg, wherein he writes, that the king of Sweden did attend his coming at Croningsburg with thirty-six men of warr; and that he had newes of his being put to sea the night between the 23d and 24. of the said October.

I lately gave you an accompt of a 371 441 15 311 much whispered for 572, and I have since found out, that 492 572 488 219 468 116 84 36 120 441 108 251 138 he proposed a match between 270 483 58 286 141 324 124 443 431 142 279 14 371 145 26 65 231 151 162 himself and one of her daughters. 41 45 104 326 144 45 81 46 207 118 390 408 65 286 260 154 55 62 466 C. May it please your LORDSHIPP,

P. 474.

THE constant experience of your lordshipp's favour towards mee, and the future well-being of those that are much dearer to mee then my selfe, embolden mee to make this humble addresse, to acquaint your lordshipp with my present condition, which it may bee is otherwise then you either apprehended or did intend it. My signet fees have hardly amounted this last quarter to above 8 l. and one time with another dos little more then mayntein my writing-clerck and buy parchment. Of my fallary of 150 l. per annum, I will willingly loose one-third to be freed from the trouble of solliciting and waiting for the rest; and for the moytie of the newes-book profitts, your lordshipp was so favourablie pleased to order mee, to receive of Mr. Needham, hee has so artificially delayed the payment thereof (sometimes pleading poverty, and that your lordshipp lay too hard upon him, contrary to your promise, sometimes promising me fayre and disappoynting mee) that hee is now in arreares with mee at least 280 l. and has lately told mee plainly, that hee will pay mee no more, upon pretext that I have devulged the matter, which has no other ground then this, that about three weeks since I was constrayned to tell one, whome I had disappointed for about 30 l. that Mr. Needhams disappoynting mee of a greater summe, was the onely cause thereof; and hereupon hee gives out threatning and high words against mee. Truly, my lord, these and the like things occasion mee manie a penfive houre. I am ashamed, and its not convenient I should trouble your lordshipp with the manie streights I meet with in my private affayres. My last yeare's settlement has bin trebly expensive to mee; other wayes of getting moneyes, then what your lordshipp has been pleased to bestow upon mee, I have none. For anie indirect meanes, I had rather a thousand times see both my selfe and mine perish, then ever cast an ey after them. As for freinds, truly, my lord, I have so estranged my selfe from the least intimacy with any man, since you have been pleased to intrust mee, that I hardly know the man, that would bee willing to lend mee 5 l. if I were never in so much want. My lord, I am verie sensible, that I ow all I have, and am, to your lordshipp's mere favour and goodnesse, which is a thousand times more then ever I have deserved, or then any other would have don for mee; and I am most willing to serve you to the utmost of my poor abilities, yea with life and all, had I a fayr call to it. My onely desire is, that I may do it with cherefulness; and having nothing to do with, nor any dependance upon disingenuous and unreasonable men for my subsistence, your lordshipp was pleased to deliver mee but lately out of a contest for moneyes (for which I most humbly thank you) and I am verie loath to have a second, but rather humbly beseech you not to let Mr. Needham know of this my addresse further then then to call for his accompts your selfe, and to provide for mee, how it shall seem good in A.D. 1658. your own eyes. I crave nothing but what is your lordshipp's good pleasure to bestow on mee; for indeed, my lord, is it not unknowne to mee, how I am envyed by some for being employed by your lordshipp, hardly thought of by others for my reservednesse, and hated by manie for my faithfulness in your lordshipp's service, I have been lately told by one, who I believe wishes mee well, that he wondered how I could possibly, conversing so little with men as I doe, procure so manie enemyes as I have, who are continually watching advantages, and laying snares for mee to out me of your lordshipp's favour, which notwithstanding, next to providence, is my onely refuge, and of which I shall never lett goe my hopes, whilst God gives mee grace to hold fast my integrity, in which I am resolved to live and dy

Your LORDSHIPP'S

Most obedient and most faithfull servant,

S. MORLAND.

Mr. Bradshaw to secretary Thurloc.

MY LORD,

ACCORDINGE to your direction I have drawne up my accounts both for the council and Mr. auditor Beale, which I here inclose. If your lordship please to peruse them, and require my further satisfaction as to any particular in them, I shall upon notice be ready to waite on you for it. The sume, which is to be cleared by a privy seall, being 3461 l. 5s. 10d. sterling, as by the foote of the accompt for the exchequer appears, I have charged my selfe within the other accompt for the council, upon the foote of which accompt there resteth due to me the sume of 2188 l. 0s. 9 d. for the payment of which I pray your lordship's favour in procureinge an order from the council to Mr. Frost for the payment of it. I am necessitated to acquaint your lordship, that in the yeare 1648 I beinge then receiver of the crowne-revenue in North-wales and Cheshire for the state, and cominge to London to passe accompts, and pay in some money to Mr. Fauconberg the receiver-generall, my lodgings in Kinge-street, Westminster, was broake into by theeves the very same day the apprentices ris in London, and and came downe to Whitehall; and 430 l. was taken fourth of a truncke in the chamber A.D. 1658. where I lay. Though it was a tyme of great distraction, yet I used such meanes with the warrants and assistants of Mr. Fauconberge, as that I found out and apprehended the fellows the next day, in which the messenger captain Compton was assistinge to me, whoe were tryed and condemned at the sessions in the Old-Bailey, as Compton very well knowes, being the sonnes of persons of note in Covent-garden. The prosecution of them cost me above 100 l. besides the greatest trouble that ever I had in my life aboute any businesse. But before my accompt could be declared by the commissioners for the revenue, whereon I expected allowance for that money, I was commanded for Hamburg; and now being to settle those accompts in the exchequer, to have out my ultimate discharge thence, I am told, that it's not in the power of the lords commissioners for the treasury to give allowance thereof in the way of the exchequer, without a privy seale to pardon that sume. Therefore I humbly request, that the 430 l. so taken may be included in the privy seale with the 3461 l. 5 s. 10 d. and then the whole will be 3891 l. 5 s. 10 d. which if your lordship be satisfied with the accompts, I pray that Mr. Nutley or Mr. Moreland may have your lordship's order to make ready for the seale. I have noe businesse but this, that requires my care to settle it, before I returne to Hamburg. I am like to have a tedious worke of it, to passe my accounts for the powder and masts; for I am to passe them by parcells with the commissioners of the admiralty, of the navy, the customes, the officers of the Tower, and before the lords commissioners for the treasury, as the auditors tell me. I did thinke, I should not have been lyable to so much truble and attendance, for what I had onely in command from the councel. I am sorry to heare of the sad condition of the duke of Courland; but I hope he will not be found to have deserved it from the king of Sweden. Begginge your lordshipp's pardone for this truble, I subscribe my selfe

Axe-yard, first November,

Your LORDSHIPP's very humble servant,

RICHARD BRADSHAW.

I inclose copies of the other accompts, if you please to looke on them.

Mr. Claypole to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

MY LORD,

I HOPE, I need not doubt of having your pardon, (that your commands have layen so long with me without any returne) in regard that my late tryalls and exercise (wherein I confesse you have not onely had a share, but a deep fence) have bene so sad and dismal to me, that I could almost wonder I have thus far outlived them; and the reflecting upon them is soe amazing to me, that I am almost lost in darknesse, when I would know the meaning and signification of this great stroake. I desire not to aggravate a thing of this kind too much, knowing well the greatnesse of your concerne in it, as also my owne weakness; but desire to submit to God as to a merciful father, who considers our frame, and that we are but dust. It is of mercy, that we are not consumed.

My lord, his late highnesse was acquainted with your commands to me concerning major Staples, and seemed very desirous to countenance and promote the thing, which you were pleased to favour and owne, but never had opportunity to doe any thing in it, as major Staples can more at large informe you. Wherefore application having been made to his now highnesse by major Staples and my selfe, his highnesse is pleased to send this inclosed by my hand; wherein although I thinke my selfe much interested, as in the behalfe of my deare sister, yet if my life and whole fortune was in it, I should desire to submit itt wholly to your pleasure and direction. I confesse, I may easily forgett the civility I ought to have, when I cast any trouble upon you, whose time and thoughts are so considerable and precious. But so farre as you have a freedome to act a charity for my sister, and therein to all her freinds, I wish it may be upon the account of your especiall grace, certaine knowledge, and meere motion.

My lord, if in the midst of your many troubles and great tryalls, which I desire to be sensible of notwithstanding my owne; I say, if you can allowe any reflection or favour to one, whose sorrowes are come like a flood upon him, who is stript of all his glory, it will be a very great reliefe and support. And although I cannot promise to make a due improvement thereof, yet shall it ever be most deare and desirable by,

MY LORD,

Your servant,

J. CLAYPOLE.

November 2. 1658.

A.D. 1658.

MY LORD,

In the possession of William Cromwell esq;

MY commission came on saturday, and was this day opened. No instructions are yet come. May-be the commission was sent before as a bait to engage me to swallow them, when they come. I must expect to be lustily threshed, when Th. hath the making of the clog. In brief I cannot expect much favour from the other side; for I am told on all hands, as well by letters as persons coming from thence, that I am a great eye-fore; and am also told from a very good hand, that they give out, that the apprehension they had of the consequences of my coming over was the cause of their late tumultuary meetings; and 'tis said I am not the only subject of their envy, but that it reacheth to Fa. Th. and Mo. who they say are particularly aimed at. Indeed, for ought I hear, his highness hath carryed himself with prudence and resolution enough. I wish with all my heart your lordship were there, and I can assure you, by the last express I had from his highness, he earnestly desires it. I hear William Pierpoint is with him, which would render your being there the more significant. Some say there is fire yet in the ashes; but Fleetwood, Disbrowe and Sydenham say, there was never any thing in the whole matter. For my part, I think things are not so desperate but there is matter enough to work upon, if you were there to bring things to a good consistence. And now, my lord, upon the consideration of the state of things in England, together with my own observation of the state of things here, I am something startled at the strange proposition made to your lordship; and, if it be possible, more confirmed in the assurance of your lordship's kindness and faithfulness to me, by your acquainting me therewith. But though your lordship thinks I may guess at the man without being a prophet, (which I suppose to be the reason you named him not) I assure you I cannot do it, and am so much distracted in my conjectures, that I cannot rest, till I know the person; and therefore I do earnestly desire that from your lordship, and conceive, that you are under no obligation of secrecy, having wisely conditioned, that it should not intrench upon his highness, the government, or myself; and upon the present view I have of things, this seems to have a great affinity with distempers in England, and particularly strikes at me; so that if I should never make any other use of it, it's necessary for my own safety to know the person, that I may be aware of his walk. Besides, who knows what a pack of roguery may be found in the womb of this business? But however this Machiavell hath traduced me, I have been always ready openly to avow myself

Your LORDSHIP's, &c.

Secretary Thurloe, to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburn.

I BELIEVE I need not give you any trouble in making excuses for my silence, being persuaded your excellency hath so much charity for me, that you rest assured, that nothing but sickness or death could have kept me from doing my duty in this kinde. I had thought to have written at large by the messenger, who was dispatched away with the severall commissions; but truly I was not able to put pen to paper without throwinge my selfe downe againe into my bed, soe weake was I growne with my distemper, which yet hangs upon me, that I cannot yet engage in publique business, though, I thanke God, I am soe farre advanced towards my recovery, that I can write with my owne hand. I perceive by the last your excellency was pleased to favour me with, that you have had an account of the motions, which have beene in some part of the army. And truly I am very glad you had it from other hands; for I must professe my ignorance to be soe great of that business, either in the first rise of it, or in the growth and tendency thereof, that I am utterly unable to give your excellency, or any other body, any rationall account thereof. Sometymes it seemed to be allayed, and a satisfaction given. Then againe the fire burst out; and at this tyme new agitations are againe on foot; and at a late meetinge of some of the principall officers and some of the councill to speake about this affaire, which was desired might be at my chamber, with a minde to declare (as was sayd) the grounds of the dissatisfaction; and somethinge was sayd to this purpose, the whole whereof was, that his highness was lead only by the advise of Mr. controller and my selfe, and that he would doe nothinge without us. Haveinge heard this, and perceivinge alsoe, that it was industriously spread amongst the officers of the army, that I was a very evill counsellor, I did desire of his highness, that I might have leave to retire, hopeinge it might be a meanes to quiet thinges, and facilitate his affaires with the whole army. And truly, my lord, I doe not yet see, what opportunity there will be for my doing further service, in the station I have done, done, either to God or the nation. I trust other honest men will have their opportunity, A.D. 1658. and may doe the same thing with my selfe with better acceptance, haveinge not beene engaged in many perticulers, as I have in your father's life-tyme, which must be the true reason of these stirrings; for they were all set on foot before his now highnesse had done or refused any one single thinge, or had received any advise from any one person whatsoever. I had some discourse with my lord Russell about your excellency's comeinge over for your health, as alsoe for my ladye's. He alsoe spake with others in it, and I doe not finde any great hesitation in it. The greatest thinge is, in what condition, and in whose hands, your excellency will leave the government in your absence. If your excellency pleases by your next (if you have not done it, before this comes to hand) to lett his highnesse knowe your thoughts therein, I hope your excellency will not long expect a resolution hence. I was not able to see the commissions, before they were sent. I heare the instructions are not yet gone, the counsell orderinge, that they should be againe revised, foe that I knowe not in what condition they are. If they be not gone, they must be sent by an expresse, by whom I shall, if I am able, give your excellency a further account.

Wee heare nothinge what hath happened betweene the Swede and the Dutch. The Swede lyes in the Sound with his fleete; and hath alsoe fortified both sides of the land to hinder the Dutch to passe with their releife into Copenhagen. I am able to give your excellency noe further trouble at this tyme.

Whitehall, 2. Nov. 1658.

Your EXCELLENCY's most humble, faithfull, and obedient servant,

JO. THURLOE.

Lord Fauconberg to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

MY LORD,

I CAN say little to your excellency this week; for things have not only a seeming tendency to quiet, but indeed (a private friend tells mee) something is now done to keepe them so. For my owne parte, I know as little how matters goe as I shall a month hence, when I am at my owne house, where I shall not cease to pray for the government, and in that for your excellency and family, in whose happinesse will be included, in no little measure, that alsoe of

May it please your EXCELENCY,

MY noble freind, my lord Broghill, has acquainted me with your excellency's bounty to me, which layes an obligation upon me to serve your lordship with all my faculties. The litle umbrages heere upon his highnes are, I beleive, vanish'd. They were managed with more insolence then discretion; and his highnes shew'd a great prudence and moderation in his proceedings, haveing not a friend that durst appear to advise him, or give him notice of any thing, that was doing, till it was done. And indeed if your excellency considers, how litle his highnes was heretofore exercis'd in publique affaires, and the great greif, that almost overwhelm'd him for the losse he had of so deare a father, it is miraculous how he waded through his difficulties at this time; and I am confident, if ever any stirrs appeare again of this nature, he will make the best and cheifest actors know their duties.

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburn.

The common newes-book hath in it the latest account from Copenhagen; but the king of Sweden's affaires in other parts are more prosperous. Major-general Douglas, pretending, that the duke of Curland had broke the neutrality granted to him by his master, made a violent inroade into his cuntry, and tooke his cheif city, and the castle wherein the duke had his residence, and put garrisons into them, and carried the duke and duches, and their children, prisoners to Riga. The duches is sister to the duke of Brandenburg, and was

A.D. 1658. was but a month since deliver'd of a child. The Portuguese, which lay before Badejoix, have drawn from the town without striking a stroke, upon the approach of the Spanish army within two miles of their trenches. There hath bin lately a very desperate mutiny for want of pay amongst the English soldiers at Dunkirk; but it is appeas'd by the care of the officers, and four of the cheifest mutineers are hang'd. The Spanish ambassador in Holland offer'd to exchange Neuport and Ostende with them for Mastrecht; but the king of France, having notice of it, hath sent to acquaint them, that if they proceed in that contract, he shall interpret it as a breach of the league betwixt him and them. The last post brought no news of the Dutch fleet, but that the king of Sweden hath put many souldiers on board his ships, and increas'd their number to forty-five, which will be ten more then the Dutch have; but it is sayd, they are not so good as theirs. Dr. Thomas Clarges, to Dr. Gorges, secretary to the lord lieutenant of Ireland.

DEARE SIR,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburne.

MY good friend, my lord Broghill, in his letter of the 20th of October, acquainted me, that my lord lieutenant had granted me 100 l. per annum, as agent for the army in Ireland, and that you would transmitt an order to me for it. I sent my lord Broghill by the last a copy of the commission I have from generall Monck, and a desire to have you write one in the same form; but least he should be gone before that came to Dublin, I have sent another to you, and I desire you will give the commission for me to Mr. William Temple, whoe will send it to me. I am pay'd in Scotland very constantly every three months out of the contingent purse; but I know not out of what treasury his excellency payes salarys of this nature, which I desire to be inform'd by you; and that to the many obligations you had conferred upon me, you will add an answer to this letter, which will be a great effect of your kindness to,

DEARE SIR,

London, this 2d of November, 1658.

Your most humble servant,

THO. CLARGES.

Date the commission from the 29. September last.
Direct the letter to me at Whitehall.

Whereas it is necessary, that there should be a meet and able person appointed agent and solicitor at London for the publique affaires, which concern the forces heere, I doe heereby constitute and appoint Tho. Clarges esquire, doctor in phisick, agent and solicitor at London to the manageing and dispatching of such busineses as concerne the forces in Scotland, hereby setting on him the yearly salary of one hundred and fifty pounds yearly for his travaile and paines in those affaires. Given under my hand and seale, &c.

H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland, to the protector Richard.

May it please your HIGHNESS,

Nov. 3. 1658.

In the possession of William Cromwell esq;

ON saturday last I received your highness commission for my being lieutenant and governor generall of Ireland, &c. for which great honour the reflection of my own unworthiness will make me always hold myself bound in gratitude to serve your highness whilst I live, altho' I were not (as in duty and good conscience I am) obliged therunto as your highness's subject. Nevertheless, I presume humbly to acquaint your highness, that I had great strivings within my breast, before I could prevail with myself to accept and open the commission, (which I did yesterday) but do not thereby account myself any thing more at all obliged to continue it, than I was at first to accept it. I considered, that if I should refuse it, that could not be done without noise and reflection upon the state of your highness's affairs; and besides, I had no reason to think your highness sent it upon any other terms, then what I was bold positively to insist upon in mine to your highness, which was presented by Dr. Petty; and that altho' no instructions came with it, I had as much reason to

to think, that either you intended to send none at all, or at least such as would not unreasonably limit me, (being assured of your highness's care and favour) as to fear your highness might suffer the industry of T. and my enemys to procure such instructions, as might make my commission signify nothing; tho' I must needs acquaint your highness, that all observing men, who heard it publickly read, took notice, that the clause, which is of the very essence of a lieutenant's commission, and was always inserted in commissions to other lieutenants, was wholly left out of this, namely the power of making a deputy, and going for England; so that I have reason to say, I hope your highness will not by this acceptance esteem me bound to continue this charge without your licence to attend your highness in person for some short time, which I humbly conceive I have now much more cause to express than ever. I shall not at all look back into the causes and reasons, which first induced me to make this humble request to your highness, any further than to say they remain still in their full force. But I do now only argue from such things, as have since happened. I find that my enemys, upon this single issue, whether I should go or not, have hitherto prevailed, and so in effect have sentenced me with an honourable banishment. I am not conscious of any crime, which might deserve it; but if they can denounce such judgments upon my innocence, they will easily be able to make me criminous, by stopping all supplies from this necessitous army, who have no more now then keeps them alive, and from destroying our young plantations by free quarter. This is the compendious and infallible way to do it; but because they will be sure of a fair blow at me, before they give me the fatal stroke, they first cut my sinews.

They render me a persecutor of good men, and handle my reputation so rudely with their coblers thumbs, that they have already begot a doubt amongst some good men, (even my friends) whether all be right. And if I suffer this continuall dropping without effectually contradiction, it may, for ought I know, prevail even upon your highness, tho' the most just and wise person in the world; or at least upon such honest men, whose good opinion I so far value, that I will rather submit to any sufferings with a good name, than be the greatest man on earth without it. And, alas! Sir, how can I check this gangreen without appearing there? My friends have not power to help me; besides, 'tis doubtfull, who are my friends, and whether they do not sute their advice to your highness concerning me more to their own ends than my safety; and if they were never so powerfull and just to me, 'tis not possible they should maintain an argument touching matters or persons, wherewith they are not fully acquainted; and my condition is now such, that my very person is not known (I a little doubt) to my nearest relations, much less my disposition and manner of life. So that upon the whole matter, I beg your highness leave to conclude, that (according to the tenor of the 2 last letters I received from your highness) I shall receive your licence to present myself before your highness this humble request to that end; and in order thereto my wife being great with child, and so like to be less able every day to endure such a journey, I intend forthwith to send her over. I have also enclosed sent a copy of a letter (mutatis mutandis) from the late king, under his hand and privy signet, to the earl of Strafford, which, so signed and sealed by your highness, will both authorize me to come, and also to appoint justices in my absence, which I rather advise should be made than a deputy, as your highness's affairs here now stand. I should be too voluminous, if I should discourse all the concerns, which lead me to this opinion; and I forbear it the rather, because I am apt to think, that your highness, having thought fitt to entrust me with the charge of this place, will the more easily excuse me for presuming to offer how it may be secured till my return. And for the army, I intend to divide it into 4 brigades, according as they now lye in the 4 provinces, and leave the charge thereof to 4 colonells, with instructions what to do, in case a conjunction should be necessary, and to bring over Sir Hardress Waller with me, and such others as cannot so safely be left there. May it please your highness, I have considered how the favour your highness intends to Goffe, &c. may be effectual; and whensoever your highness shall send the warrant, care shall be taken to have them answered, and grants perfected accordingly, tho' I assure your highness here is so little left, that it is no easy matter to do it.

General Fleetwood to Henry Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

MY DEARE BROTHER,

I THINK your last gives a very true sense of our late sadde dispensation; and we cannot too often and frequent have the thoughts of it upon our hearts; and I believe this will not be a blow felt now, but I feare the wound is too deepe for any, that can pretend to have searched into the bottom of it. Oh! no; this is a dispensation, that calls for deep heart-searching. Our present quiet will prove our great mercy. If the Lord make us so improve the season thereof, to know what it is the Lord improves us for, why should the living

A.D. 1658. man complayne? a man for the punishment of his sins; search and trye your wayes, and turn to the Lord. This scripture is surely much our case, that we ought to consider of in this day. His highnes and counsell have thought fit to confer another title upon you, and now you are lord lieutenant of Ireland. The Lord keep you humble, and close to himself in the midst of all your outward injoyments, is that, which I desire for you. The experience, which you have hade, what a poor empty thing this world is, may give the better sense how to improve what you have without an over-value of what you may injoye above others. Let it be often upon your heart, who hath raised you, and for what you are raised, and how great an account must be given of what we are to be trusted with. The Lord still preserve you in his feare and love. I am

Your most affectionate brother and humble servant.

I must begge your favour in behalfe of that pretious woman's children, widdow Tracy, who had a pention of 28 l. per annum from his highnes out of Swanfy-lands, which is now fallen to yourself; the continuance of which will be a great act of charity in yourselfe: she was a truly gracious woman, and a great sufferer; the enclosed is the case.

Most gracious PRINCE,

A GREAT dutie lies upon me to present unto your highnes my most humble acknowledgement of those gracious favours you have bin pleas'd to honour me with, which (had I windows in my brest) you would find there written as with the point of a diamond. And if it should please that God, who hath advanc't you to so great eminencye, with vertues answerable to so high a call, to make me so happie, as to be serviceable to your highnes, I think none should outrun me in that race, being driven by no artificiall motions, but by the inward principles of true love to your highnes, and to whatever else may conduce to your greatest happines. The long tract I have gone in the publick service, (thorough all degrees of my calling) with my best faith and industrye, hath met with a sad solstice, which hath eclipsed my greatest joyes; but if the beames of your highnes favour shall break forth upon me, as often they did appeere from your noble father, those clouds of misfortune, which have surrounded me, my friendes and familye, would soone vanish into ayre. Therefore, tender of your precoustyme, and with that modestie, which becomes me, to reduce myself to some particularitye, if there be any place voide in your highnes two courts of law in Westminster-hall, or in that other, wherein I served last, which your highnes shall vouchsafe to honour me with, I shall devest myselfe of that sad mantle, which I have long worne for the losse of busines, for time and repute, (the desired fruites of all our endeavours) and apply myself to such a course of action and service, as by the goodness of God and your highnes gracious aspect, shall render me what I am, and professe myselfe ever to be,

THE duchess of Savoy and the princeesses her daughters arrived the 7th at Chambery, the capital city of Savoy. The duke of Savoy comes thither in post with a most gallant court. It is much talk'd of, a second voyage of Monsieur de Lionne into Spain, to make there some propositions of peace between the two crowns. It is the rather believed, because of 30 horses, which he brought out of Germany, he hath sold none. The count of Harcourt hath been well received at Dijon. The count de Fiesque, who was the prince of Condé's agent in Spain, is there dead. The mareschall d'Aumont come hither upon his parole is gone for Bruxells to make an exchange.

Monsieur Akakia is not yet returned from the court, which makes men believe, that his negotiation between this crown and Sweden hath not been unfruitful.

15th November, 1658. [N. S.] A.D. 1658.

DAILY comes news here of the ships making ready with Portugal commissions, and the damages, which the subjects of the United Provinces suffer thereby especially, going out of the havens of Bretagne, which they have at their devotion, and men of great power interested therein, whereof I have complained; because the king's declaration of August last hath not been publish'd, or sent to the admiralty, so that the seamen and merchants know not to whom to address themselves, since it hath been publish'd in some places of Bretagne, but not yet at Nantz, so that there they will take no notice thereof; and when any suit is commenced by their high mightinesses subjects, they are delayed, and no justice done; so that their high mightinesses will in their great wisdoms finde, that it were better by force to prevent the prizes, than to prosecute the restitution upon a declaration of the king's. Notwithstanding all my endeavours I cannot hinder the execution of the prohibition of the Dutch bringing in whale oil: they have just now seized divers ships of Rotterdam and Amsterdam at Rouen for the same, and pretend confiscation of ships and goods, and 10,000 livres of those to whom they were addressed; so that the owners are in great perplexity; wherein I shall expect your high mightinesses orders.

London, 15th November, 1658. [N. S.]

I UNDERSTAND by some persons of condition, that the protector and his council have resolved to tell the ministers of Sweden, that at present he could not assist the king of Sweden their master in his war against Denmark; and I am informed they give no hopes to them of entering into such a league as the Swede hath proposed, and that the money, that was promised here to pay the damages, which the Swedes have suffered during the war between England and the United Provinces, is not like to be had as yet; and that Sir Gustave Dowalt makes account to be gone hence in a Swedish frigate here in the river, and an English merchant-ship fraught by the Swedes for transport of English officers and mariners under Sir George Askew: but yesterday they say, that they were not willing to go to sea in this season, and that the convoy demanded by the Swedish ministers was refused; so that it is believed, that this fleet now ready will be for the Mediterranean sea, or the Canary isles.

An intercepted letter.

SIR,

London, 5th November, 1658.

THERE have been so many hindrances in my way, as I could not possibly as yet speak with the person I ought to do; but the chiefest has been his being in the country. I have sent to him; so as I am sure he will receive my letter, and have said all I can to oblige him to come speedily to town, or at least give me such an answer, as I may know directly how to govern myself either in staying or returning. This is all I can yet say to that particular. As to the generall news of this place, it is beleived by the best authors of all sides, and so delivered to me, that the protectoral and republican parties are absolutely irreconcilable.

That neither party is so destitute of force or friends, as that they need fear the success, if it be to be decided by arms. That half of the council, viz. Lawrence, Montague, Fiennes, Jones, Thurloe, and Sir Charles Wolfely, are strict adherents to the protectoral party.

That eight regiments of the English army, viz. Whaley's, Howard's, Fauconbridge's, Hacker's, Ingoldsby's, Goffe's, that which was Pride's, (who is lately dead) and two more, whose names I know not, are also firm to the protectoral party.

That all the forces of Ireland, those in France, and most of those in Scotland, with Moncke himself and the fleet, intirely are also of the same party.

That whatever are left unnamed, either persons or forces, are most of them declared for the republican party.

That the answer given by the protector to the officers of the army was but dilatory only, and not satisfactory, desiring them to remit that question till the obsequies of his father were performed.

That

A.D. 1658. That the treasuries are totally exhausted, and credit decayed. That neither party wish for a parliament, the republicans fearing, that if the elections be free, the moderate Presbyterian will have the greatest power, (which they much fear) be then too hard for them always, both by law and arms.

That the fleet is preparing to set out upon pretence of aiding the Swedes; but indeed to have them in a readiness to transport their forces out of Flanders, if need be, or at least to keep them from being debauch'd by the other party, as lying idle they may easily be.

That the republicans desire a peace with Spain, and would appear to be the authors of it, by that means gaining all such as are concerned in trade to their party; as also to take away the pretence of keeping such numbers in Flanders, and the expence the nation is at in setting out such vast fleet; which they believe will be a great weakening to their enemies. That for the reasons aforesaid, the protectoral party is not willing to make a peace with Spain, tho' they neither are resolved, nor indeed are in a capacity of prosecuting the war vigorously; only keep up the name, that they may not lose the advantages they have by it.

That the republicans gain much upon the protectoral party, both in the army and in the civil magistracy also, as appears by the said lord Lisle's and Sir Gilbert Pickering's declaring for them, both which not a fortnight since were against. The like defection there has been in the army, tho' not of those before named, but only of such as were neutral before.

That all the sectaries, commonly called the godly party, are by the industry of Desborough (the head of the republicans) firmly united to him.

That the others are no less diligent in making the corporation throughout England theirs.

Order of the protector's council.

Thursday the fourth of November, 1658.

Vol. lxi p. 129. THE lord commissioner Fiennes reports a paper from the public ministers of the king of Sweden, dated this day, which was now read.

Ordered, that it be referred to the lord commissioner Fiennes and Mr. secretary, to draw up an answer to be returned to the said paper, representing his highness's readiness, that his commissioners shall meet with the said public ministers to proceed in the treaty touching a nearer alliance; and that the season of the year is not such as will admit of sending any ships; and, touching the money insisted on, to intimate the present condition of affairs, according to the letter formerly ordered to be sent to that king.

THE ambassadors and envoys of the several states of the empire arrive there but slowly, to hold there an assembly; and it was thought it would be translated to Ratisbon by the emperor's desire. There is little probability of any thing to be treated this year. At Vienna the envoy of Ragotsky hath assured the emperor, that there is probability, that his master shall be re-established; because since the death of the grand vizir, musty, and bashaw of Istria, the present governor shews much affection for him. They speak there of 12000 men, that the emperor will send into Flanders. The Spanish ambassador is going post from Vienna to Inspruck, to offer the archduke there the government of the Low-countries, and his brother the archbishoprick of Toledo, or government of Milan.

Secretary Thurloe to Henry Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELENCY,

A.D. 1658.

I WAS bould by the last post to trouble your excellency with a few lynes in reference to the publique affaires, and wish that I could have given you better satisfaction by this; but things hanginge as they then did, (if there be not a further declineinge, which I much feare) I may spare your excellency the trouble of enlargeinge upon a subject, which is only in the power of the Lord to remedye.

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburne.

I professe ingenuously, that I am more to seeke for the reasons and grounds of some late actings amongst some of our freinds, then I ever was upon any occasion, since I had any reference to the publique affaires, nothinge haveinge been done or sayd, either by his highnes, or those who are upon the matter already proscribed since his late highnes death and proclamation of his now highnes, that should give the least offence to those, who fill themselves and others with discontents; but on the contrary all wayes sought and pursued, which might unite, and remove jealousies. But nothinge will doe: dissatisfactions are still reteyned, and many things whispered up and downe to affright honest and well-meaninge people into a feare of his highnesse and government, as if the cause were in the high way of beinge lost; whereas I doe verily beleve, that there is nothinge soe much in the desires of his now highnes, as to walke in his father's steps, and to adhere to his friends; and he hath profest to me, that the greatest trouble he had was to see, that great endeavours were used to perswade many godly men, that he loved them not; and that they could not trust themselves and their concernments with hym; but that he had cause to rejoyce in this, that God had given hym a heart to love them, and to be willinge to venture all for them, and truste, that God would never suffer hym to forsake that interest, let the measure be what it will, which he receives from some men, who have a name for godlines. And truly I was greatly comforted to heare words to this purpose from his highnes. He hath beene greatly tempted and tryed; and it is to me a great token for good, that God kepes hym in this tryall, from declyneinge to that party, which I am sure favours not godlynes. And truly, my lord, his highnes hath carryed himselfe very steadily, and with honour hitherto in all these agitations; and I am perswaded is not afrayd of men.

I heare, that the single thinge, which is now stood upon, is, that my lord Fleetwood be made comander in cheife of all the forces of England and Scotland; and the reason alleadged for this is, that his highnes might not put another over his head, which they say is resolved upon. His highnes did assure the generall officers long since, before these thinges were talk'd of in the army, that he had noe such intention, nor would not; but that I perceive doth not satisfie; and yet his beinge made comander in chiefe doth not secure that at all. And now those, who have stirred in these matters, are made to beleve, that they must prosecute what they have begun, or they are lost, when I am sure his highnes intends them noe more hurt then he doth to his children. What issue this will be brought to, I know not; and this beinge the first day of my goeing out of my chamber about buisnes, I am not soe particularly informed, as otherwise I might have beene. His highnes acquainted me this day with what your excellency writt about omission in your excellency's comission as lord lieutenant. Truly, my lord, I was not able to looke after the draweing it. The comission was directed to be drawne by your father's; and I was assured, that it was verbatim accordinge to that; and judginge that to be as large as ever any was, this caused the mistake, which for the present must be supplied by the paper enclosed in your excellency's to his highnes, and be rectified for the future by another comission.

His highnes will, I suppose, at the next counsell, move them about your excellency's comeinge over hither. The delay, which hath been in it, is to be imputed to nothinge but our present disorders and jealousies, which are exceedinge great. Much enquiry there is about the persons your excellency will leave the government with in your absence. I perceive most freinds encline to the counsell, who may be made justices; and truly that is my oppinion, as affaires now stand. I could offer severall reasons for it, which I will not trouble your excellency with at this tyme, but humblye submit it to your wisdom. I humblye take leave, and rest

A.D. 1658. DEARE BROTHER,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburn.

I DOE wonder what I have don to deserve such a severe letter from you. How can I hope to have a healing of what breach hath bine 'twixt us, whilst you have such strange perswasions concerning me, as if I was guilty of any unworthynes against you? I know not what you meane by a tumult and stirre (you mention) about your coming hither. I know none, who have made such a buyfnes of it, as you mention. If the publicke be answer'd, your own perticular concernment and person is beter beloved, then I perceive you are ready to think. It is an easy thing to say you are aspersed: I wish I could tell in what; and to say his late highnes hath bine so, and you must expect the lik, I think such persons as suggest such things, doe both abuse you, and distroy the peace and quiet of thes poore nations, more then any thing else, that hath bine practised heare. So much, it seemes, is represented to you in Ireland, as I am very confydent is an untrue relation presented unto you, or else you could not have such a sence of things, as you seeme to have. You mention stories told you of the old enemyes designs. I wish the effects of it be no more than stories; and if there be no danger of their influence, it is not myselfe only deceived. I am no obstrufter of your coming: I was never so much as askt my thoughts about it but by one of the counsel, to whom I answer'd, I know no exception against it; but only askt, who should be left your deputy; and therin thought you ought to be consulted, befor you wer concluded by any settlement of ours heare; and if I have fayled towards you in that, it was otherwise intended. This readynes to receiv impressions will not be to your service and satisfaction. I should be loath to undeserve your affections; but if in this day of division you will receive all that is suggested, you neade no other burden. Condemne me not, befor you heare me, who am

MY LORD,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburn.

I WILLINGLY subscribe to your lordshipp's opinion, touching your comeing over, haveing for this last ten dayes (as things seeme to stand) been inclineing to it of myselfe, and to beleeve, that your lordshipp's presence would do a great deale of good among us; yet so as if his highnes resolve it not speedily, I would be loath afterwards to advise it; for really, my lord, delays will but give advantages to those, that wish neither you nor your relations once well. Your lordshipp may be assured, I shall further it all I am able; and certainly of the two am much more prone to erre on that hand, which brings so great a satisfaction to,

I CANNOT say the officers of the army here (that begune the late litle emotions) are satisfied, but they seeme to be. And on fryday theyr meeting of preaching and praying was fill'd with expressions of amity. His highnes hath taken more resolution in this bussines then some expected; but others (and those none of his worst friends) think he took too little. The French in Flanders, notwithstanding the great incommodity of the season, have taken Aloft, a strong place, within three leages of Bruxells.

There is nothing from Holland or Germany concerning the Swedish affaires more then what I communicated to your excellency in my last.

Yesterday the Portugall ambassador had his first audience, since the death of his late highnes, whose bussines was to condole and congratulate; a subject, which I never think of of without much consternation of minde, and therefore shall not inlarge upon it to a A.D. 1658.

 person so nearly concern'd in it as your excellency. I am,

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

Your excellency's most humble and most obliged servant,

Nieuport, the Dutch ambassador, to the protector's commissioners.

MY LORDS,

I DID hope, that I should have had a conference with your lordships on the 28th of Vol. xii. p. 176.
 October last past, and therefor by an opportunity to receive some answer, not onely concerning the marine treaty, but alsoe to other papers, which I have exhibited since my last returne into England, because it had pleased the right honourable the lords commissioners, whoe delivered, on the 19th of the same moneth, to mee, some papers concerning the three ships taken in the road off Bantam, to assure mee, that their lordships would make report to the council off that, which I had then offered and propounded to their honors, that soe things being rightly understood on both sides, all complaints and differences might bee taken away, and a more firme amitie and confidence established; to which end, and noe other, I have waited on your lordships at your houses, and communicated, that being for severall urgent domesticq occasions off my own obliged to make a step over into Holland for a very short time, I did conceive, that yf I received before my going over such an answer and resolution, as the lords my superiors expected, that it would best have enabled mee to promote the publicq service, in relation to a compleate confidence and union betwixt his most serene highnes the lord protector off the three united kingdoms, and the state of the United Provinces. Truly my intentions to that purpose are sincere and reall; and therefore having preferred the publicq interest before my private, especially in the present intricate posture of affairs abroad, I wish that it may please your lordships to appoint mee a time, that I may attend your lordships; remaining, my lords,

Westminster, this 1⁹. of
 November, 1658.

Your LORDSHIPS most humble servant,

WILL. NIEUPORT.

Colonel Doyley to secretary Thurloc.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

I RECEIVED your honour's, by the Coventry frigate, the 9th of September last; and Vol. lxii. p. 180.
 therein the very pleasing news of the mercy of the Lord to his highness and our nation, as well in blessing them with success abroad, as detecting and confounding the devices and machinations of wicked and turbulent men at home. And as we have good cause to rejoice at so general a deliverance and mercy, so we have some hopes it may redound (with his highness's favour) to our particular benefit, or at least the advantage of this place, where God hath cast us. Our great want is men, and yet have too many, unless they were better; and I know no place fitter to tame such restless spirits than this. Besides, there would be much benefit accrue; the nation would be rid of such turbulent men, the island here supplied with their chief want: and if the meaner sort may be sent, the officers will be content to allow what shall be thought fit out of their pay, for such a time as they shall think reasonable to be bound to them; and this also will in some sort be an advantage to them, who not knowing the price of peace and plenty at home, will by the looking-glass of labour be taught to value it. I suppose colonel Barry hath so perfectly informed the state of this place, that you cannot so be wanting to your own interest, as not to take some speedy course for men of some quality or other. We lessen every day, and are in the midst of many enemies; and the planting we have hopefully begun will fall to nothing without some speedy course be taken. I have made two handsome garisons or forts, and am making the third and chief, which is for security of this harbour, and indeed for the reputation of our country; but shall not be able to effect it without one thousand pounds more, being necessitated to make it of stone and brick, a chargeable way, which I humbly intreat may be speedily sent. Likewise we want some contingent money, here falling out many accidents, for which ready money must be paid. We are in want of cloaths and shoes, so that we appear more like savages

A.D. 1658. than Englishmen. And I humbly and earnestly beg, that seeing God hath placed me in some eminency, and hath given me a fervent desire of serving my country, that I may not have my endeavours stifled by being made incapable through continual wants at land and sea of such things, as are necessary and requisite for the undertakeing; but that rather my want of abilities for the carrying on so great a business may be made good by your care in supplies. However you may deal in that, I am sure you cannot render me incapable of testifying myself, as far as I am able,

Cagway in Jamaica,
Nov. 10th, 1658.

Your faithful servant,

EDW. DOYLEY.

I have sent two more colours, which I took since from the enemy, and some wounded soldiers, which I hope shall be taken care of.

General Fleetwood to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

DEARE BROTHER,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburn.

I HAVE received your late quæries, which I shall give some brief account of. As to their meeting, when I heard of their intentions therein, I sent to them to dismiss their meeting, which accordingly they did; and though their desires were of meeting the next day, yet upon what was sayde, when some of the officers came to me, and other of the generall officers, they very freely contented themselves in that disappointment; and so I appointed a meeting of all the officers upon the fryday, and spake what I had reason to say, with which, and what was sayde by other generall officers, the meeting was sent away with much satisfaction. As to the matter of the petition, I confesse I did see; but for the thing itself, I cannot call to minde any thing, which reflected upon either of their highnesses. As for his late highness, I think nothing could make any of this army have in the least such an unworthy heart; no, no, let men say what they will, we cannot, we dare not be guilty of such wretched unworthyness; and I think both in life and since, never did any army give such signal testimony of endeared hearty dutyfullness to a general and cheife majestrate, as most deservedly was due to him. And as for his present highness, he hath done nothing to deserve otherwise, then what becomes a person in his condition. And I hope we shall not be guilty of any neglect: if some have their thought, which might be the best way to preserve the honest interest in the army, and that his highness his other occasions were of that pressing necessity, that he could not spare so much time as to intend that business; and therefore desired some might be commanded to make their business upon all vacancies, to render his highness an account of such persons, as they think might best supply such vacancies, I hope it is no lessening to his highness; for what is desired is as under his highness authority, and to be commissioned by him; neither is so strange a thing; for to my knowledge, his late highness intended such a course out of this sense, how much his other affaires took up his time, that he could not attend that of business as formerly he did; besides, much more is practised and done in other armies under his highness command. As for the Savoy meeting, it was long since appointed, and a most choyce spirit appeared amongst them. I think their business and close will cleare it up. They had no unworthy design; it is far from us to encourage an imposing spirit in any: it is both against principles and practices of us. Let us be rendered as men please for mutinous spirits, we shall through grace be found both soberly honest and faithful to his highness. I am sure, I have otherwise deserved then to be rendered as I perceive by yours I am; but this is not the first time I have bene unworthily represented. I hope you know me better then to believe such things as may be reported; but the Lord, I trust, will vindicate my integrity and faithfullness. You know I have not served myself, but the publick; and so shall, I hope, still do. As for your coming into England, I am not the hinderer of it. I must, I see, beare the burden of all things, which may tend to reproach or jealousy. I know of no designs to keep you in Ireland, and shall be as glade to see you heare as those who pretend more. If your publicke capacity be not in the way, there is nothing will; neither will that be a hinderance any time. But surely you are not without account of this business from others; and certainly none can be so unworthy as to put the obstruction upon me. If it be so, I begge you to let me know the truth. Your freedom in your last much obliges me, and so it be if you will in this; let me know whether it is looked upon as lying at my doore. This will adde to your last favor in the freedom you have exercised unto

Your most affectionate brother, and humble servant.

Resolution

Resolution touching assisting Denmark.

21st November, 1658. [N.S.] A.D. 1658.

AFTER deliberation, it hath been resolved to require the council of state, that conferring with the ministers of the king of Denmark, they would think how the relief already sent and to be sent may be employed either by sieges or otherwise, to deliver the king and kingdom of Denmark from this oppression, and what instruments and other things will be necessary for the execution thereof, that so the want thereof put not back the designs; taking also the advice of some chief officers here at present. [The deputies of Zeland have not thereto consented, not having any such order.]

Mr. Downing, resident in Holland, to secretary Thurloe.

UPON Sunday last, Croke the lord Nieuport's secretary arrived here from London, Vol. lxii. p. 194.
having very narrowly escaped drowning by reason of a most terrible storm, which they met withall at sea. An English catch, whereof one Yates was master, which used to go between London and Rotterdam, which came out in company with him, was cast away neer the coast of Zeeland, and in it was drowned Mr. de Plat, Somersdike's eldest son, and the lady Herbert's eldest son, and all the rest of the company, except one man and the sending of the 4000 men, and the lending of moneys, as I gave you an account in my last, all stand still at present for want of knowledge of what is past in the Sound, which as soon as it shall come, all things are in a readiness to be put in execution accordingly. In the mean time all men are in great pain, thinking it very strange, that in all this time there is nothing come either to the state or to the ministers of Sweden or Denmark, which can be built upon, though I doubt not but by the letter by the last past, which came from Amsterdam, you were filled with news of the defeat of the Swedes fleet, which also we had here about 3 or 4 hours after the post was gone; but there is no confirmation thereof since: but that to which most credit is now given, is a letter, which Mr.

 Rosenving, the king of Denmark's deputy here, saith he hath receiv'd from a friend at Hamburg, who writes him word, that he had received a letter from a secretary at Copenhagen, wherein he gives him an account, that they had then news there, that the Swedes and Holland's fleet had fought, and that the vice-admiral of the Hollanders was sunk, and 3 Swedes ships taken, 3 burnt, and 3 sunk; and that they did not doubt, but that Opdam would prosecute the rest of the Swedes fleet, and totally destroy it.
 But this letter makes no mention either of the succours from hence, or any Swedish ships coming into Copenhagen, as the former news reported. And this is the news, that is here most credited; but 'tis withall said, and by people of credit, that a galliot (which the people on the shore knew to be one of Opdam's galliots) was seen to run upon the Sand of North Holland, and all the men drown'd; and this is render'd as a reason, why there is as yet no more certainty of what is past; but undoubtedly, if the fleets did fight the 8th of this month, (which most men here do believe, though as to the particulars they know not what to say) you will have an account by this post from Amsterdam.

The councill of state here hath demanded a million of livres for the quota of the states of Holland towards the defrayment of this extraordinary charge for the fleets and succours gone and going for the Sound; and a proposal hath been made thereupon in the states of Holland for the said money.

be no mony to be had, and without it I shall have been a meanes of the fall of the English church at the Hague, which would be to me a great trouble and scandall to his hyghnesse, upon whose account I did what I did.

There is now news come by a galliot from admiral Opdam, which brings a letter from him, dated the 2d instant, N. S. wherein he writes to the states, that he was then got as far as the Lap behind Cronenburg, and intended forward as soon as the windes would give leave; and this is all the newes that letter brings, but I suppose you will have more by this post from Amsterdam. The inclosed will give you an account of the arrival here of Mr. Luban, embassador of the elector of Brandenburg. I have inclosed heerin to you a copy of the states generals letter to Opdam, as also another copy of the points of deliberation in this assembly of the states of Holland, and of the states generals resolution, to assist the elector of Brandenburg, lest myne by the last post should be miscarried, which yet I should be very sorry for; and am,

RIGHT HONOURABLE

Your most faithfull humble servant,

G. DOWNING.

A letter of intelligence.

Hague, 22d Nov. 1658. [N. S.]

THIS morning here is arrived a galliot from our fleet, with letters of the 2d instant, from our admiral lying then near Cronenburg waiting for a wind to go forward. It is believed, that on the 8th instant there was a fight to the advantage of this state against the Swede. Mr. Dorp or Maesdam, embassador hence to the king of Sweden, is returned hither, but hath not yet made his report. Here is arrived an embassador extraordinary from the elector of Brandenburg, who had audience of the old prince of Orange in behalf of the prince of Anhalt, general to the said elector, to demand for the said general her daughter the lady Henriette d'Orange in marriage; and another embassador from the said prince of Anhalt shall have audience to-morrow of the said prince. The 40 companies

A.D. 1658. companies of foot, that are to make up the 4000 for the relief of the king of Denmark, are to be the 25th instant at Amsterdam, where colonel Killigrew hath order to receive them; but they are to be commanded either by prince William of Frise or Monsieur de Beverwaert.

Nieuport, the Dutch ambassador in England, to the states general.

London, $\frac{1}{2}$ 2. November, 1658.

Vol. lxii. p. 190.

LAST monday I received four letters from your high mightinesses, whereby I am charged to the memorials, that I presented his highness touching the last invasion of Denmark by the Swedes, which I send herewith, hoping that I have thereby satisfied the resolutions of their high mightinesses, taken June the first, and September 20th. The 2d letter was touching the consul Van Straten, and captain Ebbersbon at Leghorne. The 3d letter was their high mightinesses placard against strangers bringing in their prizes into the United Provinces, &c. The 4th was, that I should continue here. Having translated the said papers, I presently addressed myself to get the restitution of the sugar prizes here detained against all law; and having written to the sieurs Fiennes, and Wolsely, and Strickland, his highness's commissioners, to confer thereon, I endeavoured also to speak with Mr. Thurloe, with whom at length I had discourse about the affairs of the north and the marine treaty, as also of the 3 ships taken in the road of Bantam. He answered me, that he had declared it to the council; and touching the 3 ships, he asked me, if I had not received papers: I told him I had received some from the state advocate Walker; but not being signed, I had not sent them to your high mightinesses. Then I asked, if the council had taken no resolution upon my memorials. He answered, he knew not, but that he would inform himself. I told him, that if the English had suffered in the Indies, the Dutch had suffered as much at the Barbadoes by admiral Penn; and that I had other things to complain of; and that it was to be feared, that the traders would there continue on both sides; and therefore, it would be necessary at length, to know the sense of the 24th article of the treaty of peace: to which he answered, that he would speak thereof to the commissioners.

I am told to-day, that vice-admiral Goodsonn is gone hence to the Downs; and that he will be ready with 21 ships in two or three days, to sail towards the south.

[There was also another letter of the same date from ambassador Nieuport, but had nothing but concerning the Portugal ambassador's audience, and other English affairs not worth translating.]

The protector Richard to Henry Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland, and the council of that kingdom.

Vol. lxii. p. 202.

RIGHT trusty and right well-beloved brother and counsellor, and right trusty and well beloved counsellors, we greet you well. Calling to mind the great worth and merit of our trusty and well-beloved William lord Goffe, major-general of the foot in our army, and his many eminent, constant, and faithful services, and with what singular valour and prudence he hath done and performed the same to these nations in time of the late wars and otherwise; and also being made acquainted with the gracious intentions of our most dear and intirely beloved father, his late highness of blessed memory, towards the said William lord Goffe; and to compensate his desert; we are well pleased out of these considerations, and as a mark of our especial grace and favour to the said William lord Goffe, to grant unto him a lease of such of the lands of the late archbishops, bishops, deanes, and deanes and chapters in our realm of Ireland, as will amount to the clear yearly value of 500 pounds, for the term of 500 years. And to this end our will and pleasure is, that (with the advice of our counsel learned in the law in that our said realm) you forthwith cause an effectual grant for us and our successors, of such of the said lands as shall be, de claro, of the said yearly value, to be made and passed unto him the said William lord Goffe, under our great seal of Ireland, to have and to hold unto him, his executors, and assigns, from the day of the making of our letters patents thereof, for the term of five hundred years, under the yearly rent of six shillings eight pence, without impeachment of waste, together with all such royalties, liberties, franchises, and privileges, as the former proprietors, bishops or others, enjoyed, had or used, with or within the same; and that such full and comprehensive words, clauses of non obstante, and other clauses for the best benefit and advantage of the said William lord Goffe be there inserted, as in grants of like nature ought ought to be. For which these our letters shall be your sufficient warrant and discharge in A.D. 1658. this behalf. Given under our signet at our palace of Westminster, this 15th of Nov. 1658. +

The superscription.

To our right trusty and right well-beloved brother and counsellor, Henry lord Cromwell, our lieutenant-general and governor-general of our realm of Ireland, and to the rest of our council there.

Mr. Downing, resident in Holland, to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

I RECEIVED yours by the last post, and you will find by mine, which was not then Vol. lxiii arrived, that I had prevailed with the Portugal ambassador for recanting the proffer, P. 220.
which he had made of obliging his master every year to hire 20 sail of the ships of this country, which, I assure you, doth not a little trouble them here, which you will perceive a hint of in their last answer to him.

That, which most of the provinces drive at, is a restitution of their lands in Brazil.

afterwards is hard to be redressed.

The begining of this week we were full of news of a great fight, which had been between Opdam and the king of Sweden, a particular account whereof you will find in the inclosed; and I need not tell you, what a fit of rejoicing it put all men into here; but that holds not, for by letters come this day we understand, that there was no news of the Holland's fleet arrival in the Sound at that time, when the said fight was said to be; nor do we know, where they are, whereas it is yesterday a month since they sett out of the Flye. The king of Sweden hath strengthened his fleet as much as possible, consisting, with his fire-ships, of about 50 sail, and upon which he hath put very many foot with their officers, even to lieutenant-collonels and majors, and every man attends with impatience the issue; and in the mean while all things possible are doing here, in order to fur-sixteen flutes are sent from itates are also sending about fourscore officers into Norway, to train and command the people of that country, and thereby putting them into a capacity of making head against and thereby also possibly get the king of Sweden there, 207 468 134 239 199 459 431 138 144 334 362 311

150 460 304 113 475 110 59 339 395 135 160 45 68 59 66. There are also propositions on foot for the lending great sums of money to the king of Denmark and elector of Brandenburg; for your more particular information wherein I refer you to the inclosed, wherein you have the points, upon which this assembly of the states of Holland is called, wherein are very many material things of great concernment; and therefore I did labour with the more industry to obtain them for you. It will be near tuesday or wednesday next before the said states will be here, and you will perceive, that all possible ways are set down for the getting money, whereby to be able with effect to carry on what is undertaken for the assistance of Denmark. They begin much already to complain at Amsterdam for the decay of trade. They are resolved there to hazard all upon this business; and indeed if it should succeed ill, their trade would fall very low, they sending all their East-India, and West-India, and southward commodities into the Baltick sea, and from thence carrying to the southward and westward all such things as that sea affords, which was wont to employ an incredible number of shipping. So that I need not the news, which Nieuport hath sent this post, late in the year; but yet

save that it is very 355 466 339 468 171 44 213 244 170 289 there are twenty flutes, which are now making ready for the transporting of the 4000 men, which are to go for the Sound; and De Ruyter arrived three days ago in the Texel with 16 fail of 151 468 73 135 263 28 355 136 279 42 390 381. But this I should wholly think the lord protector his necessary, that 534 doe (if he have not already) forthwith give notice of 327 339 466 intentions to the king of France, and carry him along with him, 110 151 345 144 477 542 207 249 326 199 412 59 500 326, and that whatever the same.

468 448. This I take to be of very great importance upon many considerations, and that no delay be therein made; and it's best to be both upon the same foot, and at the same time; for that what might have been obtained one day, the change of affairs makes not to be had the next; and many things, wherein you 477 156 30 65 535, it is good touch the states general, the king of France, to have 542, where it may be had, as in this business I am confident it may; and to with 534 339 466 108 151 345 140. The king of Sweden hath at this time, as it's said, transported all his forces out of Holstein into Funen, except five regiments of horse, and some few foot, which are left to keep Fredericksode; so that he hath at this time twelve thousand horse in Funen, and Fredericksode is not to be attacked, unless it be first blocked up by sea, which can hardly be done by this state. 120 441 109 251 503 Prince William's friends do advise him

314 500 469 305 251 305 552. All this last week it's not imaginable, with what credit it hath been received, that the army were resolved, that they would have a general; and although some were inclined to have Fleetwood, yet that the generality of them were resolved to have Lambert, as the man they could most steadily rely upon on many accounts; and that all the council, except 6, were to be turned out, of which 6, that were to remain, were the lord Fleetwood, general Desbrowe, the lord chamberlain, the lord Strickland; and that it was a measuring cast among them, whether the lord president or the lord Fiennes should stay in; but that they were resolved not to continue them both. The name of the 6 I have not heard; but for yourself, you were the first, that was to be turned out as an evil councillor. And however slight you may make of this report, written hither by divers,

25th November, 1658. [N. S.]

THERE was received in the assembly a certain memorial of the Sieur resident Down-Vol. lxii. p. 219. ing, and at the same time exhibited many several pieces concerning the ship Postillion, and other English ships, taken at the coming out of Bantam by those of the East-India company of these Provinces. Whereupon, after deliberation, it hath been found good, that the said memorial, and the said several pieces, shall be sent to the presidial chamber of the East India company at Amsterdam, to see and examine the same, and then to send to their high mightinesses, so soon as possible, a pertinent information of all the business, to be made use of as shall be expedient.

London, 25. of November, [1658. N S.]

SINCE my last came letters from Mr. Meadows from Elsenor, and from the king of Vol. lxii. p. 276. Sweden to his ministers here, concerning the fight in the Sound. After which letters, it was debated at council table touching the Swedes demand; and yesterday I had from good hands, that it was resolved the day before, that the fleet in the Downs, consisting of 21 or 22 ships, commanded by vice-admiral Goodsonn, should go directly for the Sound; and that Sir George Askew should go in a Swedish ship within a day or two, with divers officers, and 300 mariners. The last envoy from Sweden hath taken his leave to be gone with the fleet. The messenger Hinsky goes hence to day in a bark to carry the news of this resolution to the king. Hereof I thought my duty speedily to advertise your high mightinesses.

General Monck to secretary Thurloe.

MY LORD,

I RECEIVED your lordshippe's of the 9th instant, and am very glad to hear you are Vol. lxii. p. 244. soe well recovered. I shall bee very careful to looke after our businesse heere in Scotland, and I hope shall give his highnesse a good account of any of the actinges of the enemy heere, either in the country, or from abroad. I prayse God, wee are all quiett, and well heere. All the newes that wee have from abroad is, that the Swede have defeated the Hollander in the Sound, their admirall slain, their vice-admirall taken, and the rest of their shippes taken or funke, which, wee are very confident, is true; which (thankes

A.D. 1658. bee to God) is very considerable newes, and good for our interest, as well as advantageous to the Swedes. Which is all att present from

Your LORDSHIPPE's humble servant,

Ed. 15th Novemb. 1658.

GEORGE MONCK.

Heere is one George Olyphant, that I have apprehended. I shall intreate you to lett mee know, what you have against him. I lighted uppon two or three before; but I believe hee is the person you intend, having taught schoole in England, and was secretery to Montrose in the hills. I shall intreate to heare from you what you have against him; otherwise the man being very poore, I shall sett him at liberty againe.

Secretary Thurloe to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburn.

THERE have noe letters come from Ireland the 2 weekes past, which puts us upon some difficultye as to the answere, which your excellency expects concerninge your comeinge over, which truly, my lord, is by all your freinds and servants here since my last, thought a matter of soe great moment, and hath soe great a reference to the publike, as well as to the concernements of your whole family, that it is hard for us to determine, what advise to give you; and what the grounds and reasons of our thoughts are, it is not possible to give you by writeinge, things of that nature beinge rather fitt to be discoursed of, then put in paper; and therefore his highnes is resolved to send over to your excellency a person, who may, by word of mouth, acquaint you with the true state of things here, and debate it with your excellency, wheither your beinge here or there be of most use, advantage, yea let me add, safety, to the present affaires; and may be able to tell your excellency all those considerations, which doe occur here, both the one way and the other; and havinge done this, the determination will be wholly left to yourselfe. This I will say now, that I am sure your beinge in the head of soe good an army hath tended very much to our preservation, and render'd designs against the present government the more difficult in the execution. But I will not trouble your excellency further upon this subject, reserveinge myselfe to the expresse, who will acquaint your excellency, how all things stand here, and how much things are changed, since I writt my last. As for the motions in the army, their meetings are not yet ended; and certainly great dissatisfactions doe remeyne in the mindes of severall of the officers, and it's an impossible thinge to tell, what will be the issue of this buissines. Sometymes the fire seemes to be out; then it kindles againe. Now there are endeavours to procure a remonstrance to his highnes, to assure hym of their honest intentions in all this buissines; but I finde others of the army against this way, and judge, that his highnes needs noe satisfaction in that perticuler, and can distinguish betweene the worke and the end of the worke. What this will end in, I knowe not. In the meane tyme it goes for currant, that some of the ill counsellors must be removed, before any thinge can well goe on; and there is a servant of your excellency's, who is resolved, if he be cast out here, to flye for Ireland, where he hopes he shall finde your excellency to give him protection, there beinge noe place in the world else he can be safe in. The funerall of his late highnes is to be this day senight. When that is over, wee shall begin buissines, if troubles do not begin before; I trust they will not, and then revive the debate of a parliament, and some other things of moment enough to the peace and welfare of these nations. For my parte, I have beene for many weekes a great straunger to all affaires through sicknes; and my heart is ready to breake, when I remember the stroake wee had in the death of your deare father; but I am now about the house, and will doe what I can towards my duty, without much consideringe the daunger, where I finde my way cleare.

The enclosed is an account of a fight betweene the Dutch and kinge of Sweden at sea. I have sent your excellency the very originall letter from Sr. Ph. Meadows, for want of tyme to transcribe a copy, humblye beseechinge your excellency to returne it to me by the next. His highnes hath ordered 20 ships to sayle into the Sound, to mediate a peace betwixt those 2 kings, and to secure our owne interest in those parts. I am already weary, although this be all the letters I have writt this night; and therefore will cease alsoe to weary your excellency, beseeching you to continue me in your good oppinion; beinge in all truth

Your EXCELLENCY's most obedient, faithfull and humble servant,

THE officers heere continue once a week their meetings in St. Jeameses chappell; but the time is chiefly spent in prayer. At the last time there was some litle mention of the petition, but nothing done. His highnes, by his moderation, hath pretty well allayed the distemper, and I hope there will be no eruption. I have heard privately, that they would have had five or six eminent officers displac'd; but I know not their names: but certainly your excellencie's being made liutenant of Ireland gave the alarme to those emotions.

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburne.

The Spanish army in Flanders are a litle encouraged by a late affront given to a parcell of French horse by a party from the garrison of Hesdin. They write from Bruxells, that the archduke Leopold shall come to commande in these parts the next spring; and that allreadie commissions are issued in Germany for the levyeing of four-and-twenty regiments for their succours.

The king of France is supposed to be about this time at Lyons, where there will be a magnificent interview betwixt him, the duke, and duches of Savoy, and the duke of Parma.

There is nothing come to my knowledge of the proceedings of the king of Sweden at Copenhagen, or of the Duch fleet, but what is publique in the publique printed book. I could sometimes give your excellency account of private tranfactions, but wanting a cypher, dare not be too buffy in such matters; but I shall from time to time inform doctor Petty of what I know, and upon all occasions strive to render myself in the quality of,

DEARE BROTHER,

I SHOULD be very unwilling to have the lik occation as I had in my last, of wrighting to you concerning that subject, whearin I am more charged then I shall be found guilty; but that is a subject I delight not in the discourse of, whearin you may take any occation of exception against me, I desiring so much to be found in wayes of kindnes, which to maintaine will be by more mutuall confydence, and not hearkning to reports and discourses of others. We have now received the certeinty of the late engagement 'twixt the Sweeds and Holland fleet, which though it hath bine very prosperous on the Sweeds part, yet is like to increase the flame in thos parts through this interposition of the Hollander, who designe the wafeting over of the Brandenburgers and Imperiall forces, hoping to gayn an advantage to themselves in the Sownd. How farr this concerns ourselves, I neade not tell you; and accordingly we have order'd a fleet of 20 ships to goe into the Sownde, upon the account of mediation. What other errand they have, I presume Mr. secretary will acquaint you with, whearin if the Lord please to give his blessing, it may prove of happy consequence to us. I presume, I gave you an account of a litle somme, which I moved the counsell to send you in specie, for which you must send a vessel. It is very inconsiderable in itselpe; but may a litle help you with beter coyne then I feare goes now in Ireland. We are forced again to call in your next 6 months assessments befor the time. THESE 3 daies past are full of the late newes concerning the fight, that happened betweene the Duch and the Swede on the 29. of October last, in which the Swede is said to have had the better. Enclosed is the narrative, which is extracted from the K. of Sweden's letters; and what comes from his highness's resident is much the same. Indeed the Swede hath acquitted himself in this sea encounter much beyond what was expected, and the losse of the Duch vice-admirall de Witte and his ship (which was the same, in which Van Trump was slaine) renders neither their courage nor successe such, as their owne people neverthelesse cry it up to be in this action, nor suiteable to what they have formerly done. However, though they had a fore brunt of it, yet they have carried on their releefe to Coppenhagen; and there they have the accesse of some 10 or 12 ships of warre belonging to the Dane, which will so far reinforce them, as 'tis feared they may overpower the Swede, if they come to a second encounter, to which neverthelesse the Swede is fully resolved, if the Duch fleet come forth. This great affaire fills all mens minds and mouths; and 'tis strange to observe, that those, who have bene of the cavaleer party heere, are favorable to the Duch, and the rest of the Swedes enemies; and those, who have bene of the parliament party, to the Swede, as if our divisions here had an influence upon these great transactions abroad. His highnes and councill conceive these affaires of so great import to the interest of these nations, that they have resolved to send a fleet to the Sound, which is now ready to saile from the Downes, which, if those new-growne contests betweene the Duch and Swede be not accomodated, may in all likelyhood terme very great consequences; and I wish heartily we were in a better case to beare them. May it please your excellencie, I have humbly to pray your excellencie's favor in the behalfe of my major Rawlins, whom I presume both able and faithfull for lieutenant-colonel to my regiment, which place, I understand, is void; and truly I should not have adventured to have offered him, had I not a very good beleefe of his answering your excellencie's favor and trust in that employment; and indeed having so good an assurance thereof, I accompted myselfe obleidged to preferre this humble request on his behalfe; and craving your excellencie's pardon for this great trouble, I subscribe,

Your EXCELLENCY's most humble servant,

Resolution of the states general touching the late sea-fight.

27th November, 1658. [N. S.]

VOL. LXII. P. 218. AFTER deliberation upon the letter of the king of Denmark received this day, dated $\frac{3}{13}$ instant at Coppenhagen, and news touching the sea-fight the 8th instant in the Sound, between the fleet of this state and the Swedes, it hath been resolved hereby to require Mr. Gent, and other deputies for the affairs of France, also Mr. Huygens, and other deputies for the affairs of England, to communicate these things to the embassadour de Thou, and the resident Downing, declaring, that their high mightinesses have no other intention, than to relieve the king of Denmark in this danger and oppression, in pursuance of the treaties and leagues, and to re-establish peace in those parts, and to contribute all good endeavours with other christian princes, particularly the king of France, and the lord protector of England, that so the troubles and wars between the crowns of the North, which must necessarily beget damages to their neighbours, may cease. And the said rencounter shall be by the agent de Heyde communicated to the envoys of the emperor and king of Poland, and a copy of this resolution shall be also sent to the ambassadors Bareel and Nieuport, to serve them for information, and what shall be expedient.

Intelligence sent by Mr. Downing.

Resolution upon the king of Denmark's letter.

VOL. LXII. P. 264.

WHEREUPON it hath been resolved, that letters shall be written to the lord admiral Opdam, that their high mightinesses have understood with great rejoicing and content of his diligence, and courage, and conduct, manifested in the late sea-

sea-fight against the Swede in the Sound; and that they doubt not, but that he will prosecute the victory for the relief of the king of Denmark; and that he will endeavour to recover the dead bodies of the chief officers of the fleet, and send them hither into these parts, if it may be done conveniently: and whereas their fleet, going to succour the king of Denmark, have acted only as auxiliaries, the said admiral shall leave the prizes to the disposal of the king of Denmark; yet declaring that order, which is wont to be observed for dividing the spoil in favour of those, that have taken them, leaving to his majesty the disposal of the Swedish prisoners, with charge however to endeavour, that some of them, if need be, may be made use of for redeeming such of this state as are fallen into the hands of the Swedes.

Another resolution of the same date.

SINCE it is evident by many letters come from the North, particularly by those by lord admiral Opdam of the ninth instant, that in the late naval fight in the Sound some captains did not their duties, as they were obliged by oath; after deliberation, it hath been resolved, that letters shall be written to the said lord admiral, that notwithstanding that their high mightinesses do not doubt, but that he exercises their intention, they do hereby charge him, that he inform himself exactly of the carriages of the captains and other officers, soldiers and mariners; and having found those, who have failed in their duties, he shall examine them speedily before a council of war, to punish them, and execute the council's sentences at sea aboard their ships, proceeding against them according to their cowardliness, without any favour whatsoever.

Nov. 27. [1658. N. S.]

I HAVE from good hands, that the intention of this state is to incline the king of Denmark by this fleet now sent to treat separately, and upon the treaty of Rotschill, or else to assist the king of Sweden with a part thereof, which shall be seconded by some Swedish ships commanded by Sir G. Askew, and manned with mariners, and furnish'd with cannon of this state, and to maintain the castle of Cronenburg and the Sound. The most part of the Seamen hold, that it is very dangerous for the great ships to go to the Sound at this season, but some officers of the army and others are inclined thereto in favour to the Swedes. Others say, that the king will yield up Cronenburg and the Sound to this state, so to engage them against all whatsoever. I perceive also, that the merchants and others labour to stir up new troubles. The owners of the three ships taken at Bantam continually press for letters of mart, and they give me no answer to the offer I made according to the resolution of their high mightinesses of the sixth of August last.

Yesterday I wrote to Mr. Thurloe, that I might speak with him; but he sent me word, that about the evening he would let me know the hour, which he did not till yesterday morning, that I should come at two of the clock afternoon. Then I told him, that the owners of the said three ships brag, that they had got letters of mart, or that they should have them to-day, which I did not believe. However, that I had made ready a memorial, desiring him to present it to his highness and to the council, which he promised me, assuring me also, that there were no thoughts thereof, and that they hoped, that their high mightinesses would give good satisfaction to the owners. He asked me also about the late fight. I answered, that I had received nothing thereof from the Hague. He told me, that he had letters from Elseneur, but written during the fight, without the particularities; and that he expected an order of the council touching my memorials. Afterward Mr. Marvell came to me with a letter from the secretary Thurloe, and a great writing signed by the commissioners Fiennes and Wolfely, Jones, Strickland, and Thurloe, being an answer of my memorial of the sixth, the copy whereof is here inclosed.

H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland, to secretary Thurloe.

SIR,

I RECEIVED yours of the 2d and 9th instant. I thanke you for being so particuler; yet I could wish you had given mee the names of those that mett at your chamber; and indeed if you could at any time let mee know, who meet, and where, and when, you say more then in telling all they do. But let these these men bee who they will, I hope such little knacks will not fright you from your duty. It is good to bee square, and sober, and trust God.

A.D. 1658. If they, that now seem to threaten our peace, have evill designs, and if honest men dare stand still, and not seem afraid, as they will want a specious occasion, so they will want courage to use force, and matter to work upon to make their wickednes so great, that they cannot be safe but by a greater. But I doubt the industry you speake of in using all wayes to satisfy jealousies, is the chief thing, that keeps life in their enterprize; and if you doe it simply and plainly, hoping thereby to convince, will they not laugh in their sleeve, that they are not perceived to strike deeper then open pretences? Alas! I feare their crime is not ignorance, but ambition, which in some cases is rather strengthened than cured by tampering. But why doe I talke thus? I confesse myself ignorant of the full state of your case, and therefore have noe bottom to build upon, and would have you take all that I have said for nought. Pray God direct you, and keep you close to him, and I am sure it will bee well with you. I am glad to heare, that God is so good to his highness, as to keep up his spirit in this day of tryall. If our instructions are not yett past, I wish they may hange in the hedg till I come over, which I take for granted will not bee long deferred; and I have allreadie assured his highness, that I would not stirr, if I were not fully assured, that I could secure bothe the civill and military interest in my absence. H. CROMWELL.

Mr. Downing, the English resident in Holland, to secretary Thurloc.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Vol. lxi. p. 295.

I RECEIVED yours by the last post, whereby I perceive, that you had then received an account from Sir Philip Meadows of the late fight between the king of Sweden and this state's fleets. Upon tuesday last, and not before, the states general had a letter from admiral Opdam, which came by a galliot dated the 9th instant, which was the day after the fight, and had been ever since at sea upon her way hither, by reason of contrary winds, a copy whereof I have herewith sent you, as also of all such other relations as are come thereof. But the accounts, which we have of that business, do all of them much differ from that of Sir Philip Meadows, it not being acknowledged, that Opdam hath lost any more ships than that of Witt de Wittens only; but the loss of Witt de Wittens and Peter Floris is much lamented, but especially the loss of Peter Floris, who is judged without doubt to have been the best sea-officer, that this state had; and Opdam's fleet being reinforced by the conjunction of 9 or 10 great Danes ships, a further account is hourly expected of a further attempt upon the rest of the Swedes fleet; and if any considerable part of them be gone into Landsschronen, as it is here said, it is not much doubted here, that admiral Opdam will stop up the mouth of that harbour by sinking some vessels, so that they shall not be able ever to get to sea again; and an account is also now dayly expected of the landing of considerable forces of the elector of Brandenburg at Copenhagen, and attempting the Swedish forces, which are in that island. De Ruyther hath orders to go to the Sound, and he hath 12 men of war near ready; and it's said, that some 3 or 4 more shall be joined to him, which they hope also to have ready; and there are also 16 great flutes near ready for the transporting the soldiers and provisions. The council of state did send for Monf. Beverward, and some other of the chief officers of the army, that were in town, to have their opinion, whether it were best to send the remaining 4000 men now or in the spring. They gave their opinion, that considering how far the season of the year was advanced, and the want, which was like to be of necessaries for them, how great a weakning 'twould be to their own strength at home, and the impossibility in their opinion of besieging Cronenberg castle in this winter time, by reason of the great frosts; that for these, and other reasons, it were best to delay the sending of them until the spring. Yet notwithstanding such is the instance made by the Danish ministers, and such as assist them, that orders were issued out the day before yesterday to all such officers, as were not yett gone, to repair to the rendezvous at Amsterdam; and they are accordingly gone in all haste, and there the soldiers are in boats, not being suffered to come into the town, and in those boats are to be transported thence to the flutes, to the Vlye, and so to the Sound.

The states general do earnestly press, that part of them

I have herein inclosed to you the resolution of the states general upon my memorial you will see they have sent it, together with the papers therewith presented to the East which yet they did not do, till the

as was expected.

84 217 488 294 426 28 145 279. Some time the beginning of the next week I understand that the deputies of the states do intend to have a conference with me about theis ships; and they say, that much is untrue, that is alledged. I tell them, that enough is too clear, to wit, that the ships were taken merely upon the account of trading with their enemy, and that not in counterbanded goods, and that in places not blocqued up as Cadiz hath been by his late highness, or Lisbon by them; and plainly, that his highness, that now is, is resolved to have reason done him in this business; and that whatever orders or instructions they may think fit to send to their ambassador at London, yet that it is in vain for them to expect any issue thereof, until satisfaction be given in this business. I do earnestly also wish, that you would be pleased seriously to take order for the restoring of that ship mentioned in one of mine by the last post, which was taken in open sea by general Penn in the West-Indies. It would stop many mens mouths, and take away the whole cry of that long list of ships said to be wrongfully taken in the West-Indies, whenas in truth, so far as I can understand, all the rest of them were taken actually trading at the Barbadoes, contrary to the law of England. There are several ships come into this country lately from Barbadoes, and one which hath been trading at Jamaica also, whereof I thought it my duty again to give you notice.

The king of France, finding that the prince of Condé's instruments did all make their way out of Flanders into this country, and so hence, for avoiding suspicion, into France, hath given order, that all such Frenchmen as come into France from this country, shall be secured, unless they have the pass of his ambassador residing here, which is a great stop to their frequent passage to and from France by this country; and thereby he hath notice of such persons as do pass to and again; and whether such a course might not be of use for you, is worth consideration. This country is but very small, and this the French ambassador practiceth constantly.

Three regiments of the elector of Brandenburg's forces are most of them cut off by a fally of the Swedes out of Fredericksode; and some letters say, that the general of the Poles is taken, but that is not certain.

Just as I am writing hereof, I have received yours of the 16th instant, which you sent me by a man of war; and because it is near the going away of the post, I can only say, that I shall endeavour to observe such instructions as you have therein sent me. I do

Your most faithful humble servant,

This week we have news from England, that a small English frigate being encountered by two Dutch men of war, she commanded them to strike; which they refusing to do, they fell to fighting; that most of the men in the said English man of warr were killed in the frigate. This is written hither by the same person, that wrote hither the news of most of your councell's being to be turned out; and scarce a week but that hand writes some malignant story hither, which may not be amiss for you to know.

I could not rest satisfied, but have been with 532; and though he hath no 343, yet I have prevayled with him, and to-morrow he will give a memorial with me. But if you ^{the Fr. emb.} ^{instructions,} intend clearly to carry 542 500 510, you must let them know you will also be willing ^{the k. of France with you,}

 secretary Thurloe.

THE council having by your letters understood the state of the treaty of peace between the king of Portugal and the lords the states general of the United Netherlands, and that the proceedings thereupon have been such hitherto, as give no great hopes of any speedy conclusion thereof, but that the war between them is like to be continued; and although they are sorry, that the former good offices of this state for reconciling the differences between them have not been more successful, nor the great importance of that affair made great impressions upon the minds both of the one and the other, yet the council are still resolved to continue their utmost endeavours, in all friendly and amicable ways, for the re-establishing of a good understanding between them. You shall therefore, therefore in the name of this state, do all good offices both towards the lords the states A.D. 1658.

 general, and the ambassador of the king of Portugal now residing at the Hague, for accommodating the differences yet remaining between them, and shall by such ways and means, as you shall find most proper and effectual, represent to the particular lords of the government, to the states of Holland, and also, if it be necessary, to the states general, the great desire that this state hath to see the war between them and the king of Portugal well ended; looking upon it as that, which is not only prejudicial to their own navigation and commerce, and also that of their neighbours, but to be of most dangerous consequence, in other respects, it being a thing not to be expected in a human way, that the king of Portugal should be able to defend himself both against Spain, now ready to assail him, with an intire and united strength, and against the army of the United Netherlands also. And this state doth conceive, that the greatest security, which the states general can possibly hope for by this war, can't in any sort recompense the detriment, which will befall themselves, this state, and, most of all, the common interest of that religion, which we both profess, if the kingdom of Portugal should at this time fall into the hands of the king of Spain, who by the late peace with France is also become formidable to all the Protestant party in Europe. Upon which grounds we hope the lords the states general will maturely weigh, and make such reflection upon these things, as the nature of them requires; and rather abate of their demands (the justice whereof we object not to) for peace sake, and to prevent a greater danger, than by peremptory insisting thereupon, to run the hazard before expressed.

2dly, In case you find, that a peace cannot at this time be obtained, you shall propound a truce to be concluded between them for some years, upon such conditions, in reference to trade, and otherwise, as may be of mutual convenience to them both. And if during the truce (the treaty being continued) the main questions may possibly be determined in an amicable way, or if not, but that the war must be renewed, it is to be hoped, the time for it may be more seasonable, and that a war then will not be so hazardous in all respects as in this juncture.

3dly, If either a peace or truce can be obtained, you shall then endeavour to dispose the states to consider with England touching the means for the preservation of Portugal out of the Spaniards hands, which their interest doth oblige them to, equally with that of any other state; and they are not hindered by any of the publick treaties, which they have with Spain, but that they may give assistance to the crown of Portugal.

4thly, Whereas by your letter of the 7th instant, N. S. you give an account to the council of an alliance designed by the states general to be made between France and their commonwealth, wherein are many things of great consequence to England, and of the representations, which you have made of that affair to those of the government; the council doth well approve of your carriage therein; and you are further to desire a sight and communication of the particulars of the intended alliance; and that, in case they shall think it adviseable to proceed therein at this time, you shall insinuate, as you have already begun, the conveniency and necessity, in order to the common good, of having a business of this nature managed by their joint counsels with England.

5thly, And upon this occasion, you shall take notice to them of a proposition, which hath been here discoursed between the council and the lord Nieuport, ambassador of the United Netherlands, touching a defensive alliance to be made between England and that state; whereinto might be drawn such princes and states, as might either from their principles in religion, or other interests, be of use to the Protestant party; and that the said ambassador declared, that his superiors were very ready to co-operate with England in all things, which might be thought advisable to be done for the defence of the Protestant religion and professors thereof. You shall therefore endeavour to understand, how that government stands disposed to any counsels of this kind; and whether they have thoughts of any means to obviate the dangers now impending, declaring to them the sense, that this state hath hereof, and the readiness they will find here for the ends aforesaid.

6thly, And in case you find them inclined seriously and in good earnest to consider these things, you may, as you have opportunity, confer with such of them, as you shall think fit, touching the affairs, as they stand between the emperor and the Swede; and whether means may not be found to induce France to engage with England, Sweden, the United Provinces, and such other princes and states as will join them in a defensive league, upon terms wherein France may find its own interests, which seems not difficult to be done, in case a peace be not concluded between the emperor and Sweden. And in case any thing of this be thought practicable, then you shall endeavour to have it so ordered at the Hague, that their ambassador intended for France may have instructions to deal with the French court therein; and that no alliance may be propounded to France but in conjunction with this state.

7thly, Whereas, in pursuance of your former instructions, you have communicated unto the lords the states, what the sense of the council was touching the satisfaction de-

A.D. 1658. manded of the king of Denmark by their lordships, for the charge their state had been at in assisting against Sweden; and not understanding, that there is any answer yet returned thereunto; and perceiving by the lord ambassador Nieuport, that satisfaction and security for the payment thereof is expected from the said king; and although he is pleased to disclaim all intentions in their states to take into their hands and possession either the feignory of Drunheim, or any other part of the territories of the king of Denmark; yet he acknowledgeth and maintaineth the justice of their demands of satisfaction, and the taking the profits of Drunheim, as a pawn and pledge for securing the payment; you shall therefore let the lords of that government know, that you have received new orders to confer with them upon that subject; and that it is not only the actual possession of themselves of Drunheim, that this state expressed jealousy of, but are also very much unsatisfied, that the United Netherlands should expect any satisfaction of the king of Denmark, for the charges they have been at in this assistance, their fleets and forces having been employed, in conjunction with those of England, upon treaties made between them and France, not so much for the assistance of either king, as for the compelling both of them to make peace upon such terms and conditions, as the 3 states agreed upon; having respect therein to the common good of ourselves, as well as of those 2 kings; and upon this ground, England hath not demanded from the one or the other any satisfaction, for the great and vast expences the same hath been at, either by their fleets or embassies, for the making of this peace, which yet they have the same pretence to as Holland hath. And it will be very hard upon the king of Denmark, to be compelled to make peace upon terms agreed upon by other states, without him, and contrary to his own inclinations, and then be constrained to be at the charge himself of that compulsion. And if he must pawn his provinces to his friends for the charges of making the peace, it will not make his condition much better, than if he had lost them to his enemies in the war, especially if the greatness of the sum be considered, which, without doubt, the United Provinces (if we may make the computation by the charge of our own fleets) have expended upon this occasion; for the securing the payment whereof a great part of the United Provinces will be required; and although the profits of Drunheim are first to be applied for the re-payment, yet it can't otherwise be but the possession itself must needs follow after.

It is to be considered also, that England, both in respect of its own, as also for the common interest, is obliged to favour the king of Portugal, and to afford him supplies in his wars against Spain; and to that purpose a treaty hath been lately made with him, a copy whereof is herewith sent to you, to the end you may communicate the substance of it to the states general. If now the war be at the same time continued between Portugal and the United Netherlands, it is to be feared, that occasions of difference and misunderstanding may fall out between these two states, the preventing whereof is equally to be endeavoured by both sides; and the council doth believe, that the states general have that sense of the present posture of affairs, that they themselves will not advise this state to forbear their assistance to Portugal against Spain, and thereby suffer Portugal to fall into the hands of Spain. It must then necessarily follow, that the United Netherlands ought, out of their desire to maintain a good understanding with England, to contribute their endeavours to establish the peace aforesaid.

Vol. lxi. p. 302. THE states here are resolved to send away the 4000 that are behind the Denmark, the 8th of December. They are to go to sea in 20 fly-boats, to be convoyed by 4 men of war: colonel Killigrew commands them; and order shall be sent to Opdam to come and meet them with all his fleet; and that he shall return home with 12 or 16 ships, and leave the rest to winter in Denmark; and the prizes taken by him he is to give to the mariners.

The old princess of Orange hath communicated to the states the marriage concluded lately between the prince of Anhalt and the princess Henrietta her daughter.

Vice-admiral de Ruyter last monday made report to the states of his return from Portugal, having been there 4 months without doing any thing, because the Portuguese durst not come out of the river of Lisbon. He greatly commends the English frigats, which he met thereabouts, of whom he received all civility and courtesy imaginable.

TWO days ago I sent my son with letters, whereof here are the copies inclosed. The same day the secretary went to his house at Kensington, to stay there till after the burial. This afternoon I visited him, to have some interpretation of the writing given me by the commissioners. He told me, that if their high mightinesses would declare, that they would not tie the peace between the two kings to the emperor and Poland, and that they would divert the elector of Brandenburg from joining with that party, they would make some proposals thereupon. I find also, that they have sent new orders to Mr. Downing, touching the said writing; also that the fleet of 22 ships went yesterday to Yarmouth to ship some pilots and mariners. The frigate, Maidstone, of 50 guns was to join with them, to transport also the last envoy from Sweden. The secretary promised me, that after the funeral he would endeavour to get me an answer touching the 2 prizes of sugar, and my memorial of the 3 Bantam ships.

NOT long since was sent relief to your majesty by our fleet under the command of the Sieur de Wassenaer or Opdam, which also is happily arrived; since which time we have issued forth again letters patents for 40 other companies of foot, to make up the number of 6000 men, which have been promised by the treaty of alliance, and resolved this morning, that the said relief shall be speedily sent, to the end that during their voyage it may be manifest by this new levy, what we have found fit to make known to your majesty, that the 7th of the next month they are to go to sea, if time permit; praying and recommending to your majesty, that in the mean time lodging and fire, and other necessities, may be provided; and to use them as our own militia, manifesting to them all kind of favour and good will, as occasion shall be, which will be very acceptable to us; and our militia shall be thereby the more encouraged to do their duty in serving your majesty.

Intelligence sent from Holland by Mr. Downing.

BY other letters of the 13. and 15. instant N. S. it is written, that eight great Danish ships are joined with the Hollanders, and that the Hollanders have sent 8 of their own ships, which were disabled, into Copenhagen: That upon the 10th instant they had taken a Swedish man of war, which was then coming from Sweden, to join with the Swedish fleet, and had chased two Swedish ships on shore near Landschronen: That the 11th instant soldiers landing at Copenhagen took their oaths of fidelity to the king of Denmark: That in the islands of Laland, Langland, and Falster, great store of furniture of war are making ready for 5000 Brandenburgers, that are to be transported out of Holstein; and that a fly-boat sent with letters from admiral Opdam was lost by a tempest with all the people that were in her: That on the 15th instant, the Hollander and Danes continued to block up the Swedish fleet, part in Cronenburg, and part in Landschronen. This news comes by several particular letters, to which no full credit can be given. In the mean time three regiments of Brandenburgish forces have been totally routed by a sally from the Swedes out of Fredericshode; and some letters say, that the general of the Poles is taken prisoner. The 4000 men, that are going hence for Denmark, are almost ready, and so also is vice-admiral de Ruyter with 12 men of war. The death of de Witt and Peter Floris is greatly lamented. 400 Hollanders, which were killed in the fight, are buried at Copenhagen; and there are very many wounded there.

Resolution touching relieving the king of Denmark.

November 30th, 1658. [N. S.]

Vol. lxii. p. 281.

THE advice of the admiralties of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and North Holland being read touching the demand made by the king of Denmark for a part of this fleet to stay all winter in Denmark; after deliberation it was resolved, that 12 ships should be there left this winter; and to this purpose letters should be written to admiral Opdam, that he should leave 4 ships of Amsterdam, and 2 of each other admiralty; and if the Swedes strength required more ships to be left, he might have 3 or 4 more ships upon the king of Denmark's desire, observing the said proportion for the several admiralties. And because the ships to be left must be victualled, and for transporting there must be fly-boats fraught, it was resolved, that letters should be written to the admiralty of Amsterdam, that they shall freight them, and buy the provisions in presence of the other admiralties; and a month's pay shall be given to all the officers and mariners, that shall stay there: and the council of state shall be required to agree with the receiver-general for one hundred thousand florins, to be employed for all these charges, upon condition that it shall be repaid out of the moneys, which are not yet paid by the provinces for the equipage of the sea; and to execute the same with all diligence. And hereby is authorized the vice-admiral Ruyter to command all the ships of war left in Denmark; and for this purpose, to go to Copenhagen with the men of war appointed for the convoy of the 4000 men, and to command them also; taking also, if he think fit, his own officers; and being there arrived, or at the Sound, to put himself aboard the ship called the Joshua, or such other he shall please to chuse; and he shall have an order, whereby he may have power to command the ships, that there remain, and all in them; and to this end he shall be dispatched without delay.

Mr. Downing, the English resident in Holland, to the states general.

Vol. lxii. p. 309.

THE underwritten resident of England, &c. having received the resolution of their lordships the states general of the 27th instant by the agent de Heyde, wherein they do declare, that their intention in intermingling in the present war between the kings of Denmark and Sweden is no other than to re-establish peace in the northern parts, that so they may afterwards with all their power co-operate jointly with other Christian princes, and particularly with the most serene lord protector of England, and the king of France, to the end, that those parts may be freed from all sorts of troubles and wars, which tend only to the prejudice of their neighbours, represents, that his most serene highness his master hath most heartily accepted of the said offer, and is now ready to co-operate with the king of France, and their lordships the states general, for the said ends.

And his said highness doth conceive the most proper and most probable means hereunto conducing to be a joint offer of a mediation for making a peace separately between the kings of Sweden and Denmark, without intermingling of any other interest or matter whatsoever; nor doth he doubt, but that this proposition will be very acceptable to the states general, considering that they have herein the same interest, and that they are wholly at liberty to endeavour the said peace in this manner, not being engaged in any offensive treaty against the king of Sweden, but only in a defensive treaty with the king of Denmark, as hath lately been declared by their ambassador now at London, in his memorial of the 6th instant.

And his said highness is the more stirred up to the moving of their lordships hereunto, in regard of the reports scattered abroad, as if (notwithstanding what hath been declared as abovesaid by their ambassador) their forces were to be joined with the forces of the house of Austria, and as if their fleets and shipping were to be made use of for blocking up by sea such places as should be besieged by land by the imperial forces now in Holstein, and for transporting considerable parts of them, a thing which doth in no-wise seem to his master to tend to the restoring of peace, the liberty of commerce in those parts, but to have accidentally in it most dangerous consequences, even to the hazard of putting the command of the Baltic sea into the hands of the house of Austria; and therefore to be hindered by his master to the utmost of his power, be it by whomsoever attempted.

And considering the present posture of affairs in these parts, and to the end their minds on both parts may be the more inclined and disposed to the acceptation of the said mediation, his said highness doth most affectionately desire, that it would please their lordships to forbear the sending any further supplies of men, ships, or other warlike provision into these parts for the assistance of either side.

And

And as to what may concern other the friends of his master and this state now also in war A.D. 1658. in those parts, he will be most ready and desirous, together with France and the United Provinces, to use his utmost endeavour for the obtaining and settling peace amongst them also, and doth not doubt of a good and happy issue of these his endeavours in this separate way to the freeing of the aforesaid kings of Sweden and Denmark, and other his good friends in those parts, from the great dangers they are now in, especially if it shall seem good to their lordships heartily and thoroughly to concur therein. But however, his master is resolved to proceed upon this foundation; and to that end to employ such means, as God hath put into his hands, leaving the issue to him, who is the only wise disposer of all things.

Given at the Hague, the 30th of November, 1658. [N. S.] Signed,

G. D.

The French ambassador to the states general.

THE underwritten ambassador of France, having considered and examined the resolution Vol. lxi. p. 311. of the 27th instant, received at the hands of the baron de Ghent, finds himself obliged to assure their lordships by this present memorial, that the intention of the king his master is still, as it was, to endeavour by his ministers with all possible diligence the reconciliation of the kings of the north; and that he cannot see without extreme grief and displeasure, that the treaty of Roschfield hath not had its effect, and hath not been perfected by reason of the suspicions and diffidences, which have been cast into the minds of the two kings, and of their council, by the artifices of those, who will have no peace, and who seek indirect advantages in the continuation of war, which they would continue through all Europe, although till now it hath been very advantageous. Wherefore the said ambassador believes it to be his duty to represent to their lordships, that in the intention, which they profess to have for peace, it behoves them nearly, that they suffer not themselves to be surprised in entering into new engagements, which renders the accommodation not only difficult, but as it were impossible, and in sending of new reliefs of such importance, and in such a season, which may cause one to doubt of the truth of their intention; as also not to pretend to make a general peace, which may comprehend those, who (it is well known) desire it not, but those who are truly in war, and have a common interest to get forth; and for this end to enter speedily into the matter, and make propositions jointly with England, who prepare things for an accommodation, and to search all security possible, that may render it firm and lasting, which leaving to their wisdom, he offers them all what his care may contribute for the advancement of a work, wherein all sides may find contentment.

Resolution of the states, on sunday, after the morning service.

1. December, 1658. [N. S.]

Vol. lxii.
p. 281.

AFTER deliberation it was resolved, that letters should be writ to the admiralty of Amsterdam, that their high mightinesses, having seriously and again considered the business of the transportation of the relief of Denmark, have thought fit to require, that they would endeavour to add some more ships for convoying the 4000 men appointed to go for Denmark, so many as they shall judge necessary for the safety of them; and to confer with colonel Killigrew, and to put aboard the said ships some musketeers of the militia of this state for their more security, as the service and reputation of him is therein interested; and this shall be dispatched without delay.

Mr. Downing, the resident in Holland, to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Vol. lxii.

BY the post I gave you an account, that I had received yours that afternoon, which you sent me an exprefs from the Downs; and that I had been with the French embassador and Mr. Appleboom, as I therein gave you an account. And tho' I had prevailed, as I then wrote to you, with the French embassador, to give in a memorial with me the next morning; yet after 10 at night he sent his master of the horse to me, to let me know, that he found some new difficulties therein, and therefore he desired, that it might be deferred till monday or tuesday; to which I returned him for answer, that the 4000 men were now upon the very point of going away; and that the loss of two or three days time would upon that account be irrecoverable; that Mr. Appleboom had that night writ to his master, that both of us would the next morning without fail give in memorials; and therefore that we were obliged to it, besides the consideration of the fleet's being on the way; and therefore earnestly desiring him, that he would continue firm to his first resolution. And the next morning early I went to him again, but found him much wavering in his mind; and he told me, that the thoughts of the business had wholly broken his sleep that night. But I was very earnest with him, considering of what importance it was, that both of us should go together, and how ready people here would be to have made constructions of it, if both the memorials had not been given in the same day; and to have taken courage to have taken some resolution, which it may-be they will not now be so forward to. The truth is, the embassador had a hard part of it, on the one hand, considering how much it imported his master not to seem wholly negligent of the king of Sweden, when England should own him so highly by word and deed; and this, as I had told him, by the communication with and instigation of France. On the other hand, it was hard to be put to give in such a memorial without any orders at all, but especially upon the account of making a separate peace between Sweden and Denmark. He was free to have given in his memorial so, as mention might indifferently have been made of the king of Poland, and elector of Brandenburg also, with the exclusion of the house of Austria only; but he said, it was hard to put him without particular orders to move for the making a particular peace between Sweden and Denmark; only he said, that Poland was very considerable; and that if they were wholly neglected, it was the right way to make them fall wholly in with the house of Austria; and that possibly the emperor, or some other of that house, should be chosen king of Poland, in case this king should die, a thing of A.D. 1658. very bad consequence; besides, that the queen of Poland being a French woman, and highly maintaining the French interest in that court, and having indeed very great authority and interest, that by no means they might seem to neglect her. I told him, that it was notoriously known, that England and Poland had always been in a good understanding each with other; and that I was very sure, that his highness would also be willing to help the making a peace between Sweden and Poland, so as it might be with the exclusion of the house of Austria; but that it was very evident, how much his interest was interwoven with that house; and that while they should be able, under the notion of making a general peace, to continue the war in Denmark, it was clear, that they would make no peace; for that the war continuing in Denmark, the Poles had liberty to besiege and take by force their towns in Prussia; but that when they should see, that England and France were jointly resolved to pursue a separate peace between Sweden and Denmark, they would then also think of hearkening to reasonable terms: whereas it is evident, that as things now stand, the Poles do refuse such propositions made by the Swede, as before this late war in Denmark they did not expect, the king of Sweden having lately declared his willingness to accept a very small equivalent in money for the restitution of Prussia. In fine, I did prevail with him, and to couch it in such terms as you find; a copy thereof, together with mine own, being herein inclosed to you. I did endeavour to couch mine own in such terms, as might give least offence here, but especially to him; and upon that ground have therein also made mention of his highness's readiness in a separate way, to deal for his other friends in those parts, without which I could never have persuaded him to have given in this memorial; but that upon that account I did let him see, that his highness would be as ready as the king of France to deal for the king of Poland and elector of Brandenburg, and that this desperate way of treating would only produce the effect desired.

I need not tell you, how much the states general were startled at these two unexpected thunder-claps coming thus both together. My lord Nieuport, as you will find by his letters, had still written, that his highness's fleet would not go for the Sound, but towards the south; nor is it yet known here, that it is gone or going that way, nor do I think fit to divulge it, but to let that news come of itself by the post; whereby they will see, that his highness is in earnest, which now I only endeavour to persuade them to believe by words, that so upon other occasions they may give the more credit to what I shall offer to them. The states of Holland have taken both these memorials into their hands to deliberate upon, and to-morrow they intend to begin to consider of it; and according to what resolution shall be taken by them, so will the matter go in the states general. As soon as we gave in our memorials, we sent to Mr. de Witt, to desire, that we might both that afternoon come to speak with him together. He returned us for answer, that he had so much business, that he could not possibly appoint us any time that afternoon, but desired, that we would come to him the next day at 4 in the afternoon, which accordingly we did. I told him, that his highness was very sorry for this late unhappy unexpected breach between the kings of Sweden and Denmark, and very apprehensive of the consequences of it; that he saw no possibility of making any comprehensive peace to the satisfying of all parties, that were now at war in those parts; but that in that way of procedure, it would be still in the power of the house of Austria to hinder any good issue of what should be undertaken; and that therefore his highness was resolved to proceed in this separate way, hoping for a good issue thereof, but especially if this state would heartily concur therein. He said, that this state had no other end than the making peace between them; but that they did not so well understand this separate way of proceeding; but yet that possibly they might be brought to agree therein, if first they might have assurance upon what grounds the king of Sweden and the king of France, would proceed; for, said he, unless those two kingdoms be somewhat evenly ballanced in their power, they would be perpetually in war, and consequently this state put to a perpetual charge in defending the one of them; and therefore, that he thought, that the treaty made in the year 1645 between these two kingdoms, ought to be the ground of the peace; and that the king of Sweden ought to quit all he had got by the treaty of Roschfield. The French ambassador told him, that was a most unreasonable and ridiculous proposition; but, saith he, we are to look upon this war, that now is, not as a new war, but only a continuation of the last war, upon the account of the jealousies risen between them, upon the non-full execution of the late treaty; and that for his part, if the treaty of Roschfield were waved, he saw little hopes of making any peace; for that he saw no other ground, whereby to be able to prevail with the king of Sweden to quit the footing he hath in in Fredericshode, Funen and Zeeland; but to speak of quitting Schonen, and those other things which were yielded to him by the said treaty, he thought it was a long war, that must bring him to that. I told him, that for my own part I had no particular orders, but only in general to assure him, that in case this state did not think fit to join with his highness in this separate way of treating, that he would endeavour to gain the best conditions he could for the king of Denmark; but, if I might speak mine own opinion, that considering

A.D. 1658. { dering how matters now stood with the king of Sweden, I did very much wonder, that this state could imagine to bring back that king to the treaty of 1645, who hath in his possession not only his own part of Denmark, but in a manner all the rest; and that they should do well to consider, that the winter was now coming on fast; and if such another frost should happen as was the last winter, that undoubtedly the king of Sweden would march into Holstein, and endeavour to fight the elector of Brandenburg; and if he should beat him, that then they might judge what would be the consequences thereof; besides, that the king of Sweden had well fortified three quarters in Zeeland, and provided them with all necessaries for horse and foot, and so would be able to maintain his station there against any, that should come to attack him, if any forces should be transported by their shipping into that island; and if the castle of Gottorp should be delivered into the hands of the imperial forces, and that the said forces should get footing in Zeeland by their means, that they would do well to consider, whether this would be for their interest, and whether it would be then in their power to say upon what foundation the peace should be made. Besides, I desired him to consider, that the treaty, which this state had with Denmark, was only a defensive treaty to defend the king and kingdom of Denmark, and not offensive to augment its territories; but that Schonen, and what else was yielded to the king of Sweden by the late treaty of Roschfield, was not now any part of Denmark, but rightfully belonging to the crown of Sweden; and therefore, that for the state to speak the crown of Denmark any of those places, was to change the nature of their league defensive into a league offensive against the king of Sweden. De Witt did confess, that their ambassador Boreel had propounded to the court of France, that procedures should be made to the making of a treaty between them upon the aforesaid treaty of Roschfield; and that he believed, that thereupon orders had been given to the French ambassador to make this proposition; but withal he seemed to be very angry with Boreel, saying that he had made that proposition without orders. We both took hold of this, though neither of us had any knowledge of it before, and asked him, how in honour they could go back from what their ambassador had proposed?

We had much discourse with him about the 4000 men, which are sending away in such haste; and told him, that the sending of them could produce nothing but evil; and that Mr. Appleboom had already orders to go hence. He desired earnestly, that we would use our endeavours for the staying of him; and that what they had done ought not to be construed as a war with the king of Sweden, but only as an auxiliary supply to the king of Denmark. We told him, that at his desire we would do our endeavours; but that we doubted we should be able to prevail very little therein, unless the 4000 men were stopt. To which he answered, that to speak as a minister of state, he ought to say, that they must go, they being part of that supply, that they are obliged to give the king of Denmark; but to speak as one endeavouring with us to make peace between them, he must say, that assuredly they ought not to go. This is all we could draw from him upon that business, upon which nothing of certainty is to be founded. In the conclusion, the French ambassador told him, that there was one article in the treaty of Roschfield concerning the passing of the ships of enemies through the Sound, of which the ambassador of this state had so much complained at Copenhagen, which for his part he neither understood nor liked; for that, said he, it may be applied to France or England, or whomsoever they pleased; and therefore, for his part, he thought it very fit, that that article should be cancelled at the joint desire of the mediators, it not being good, said he, that there should be any treaty, or any article of any treaty on foot, by which either of those kings might claim from the other the exclusion of the ships of any with whom they should be in war; but that it was all our interest, who were out of the Baltic sea, to keep matters so, as that in case of being in war with one of those kings, we may yet be able to pass the Sound, and supply ourselves with the commodities of that sea by the favour of the other; and that he did wonder, that the ministers of France or England could consent to that article, which may be of so dangerous consequence to them both; and that, that article being abolished, he knew nothing this state had to object against the treaty of Roschfield.

From Mr. de Witt we went both to Mr. Appleboom's, giving him a full account of what had passed between us and Monsieur de Witt, whereby we said he might take his measures as to what was the inclination of this state, but withall desiring, that he would write seriously to his master, that he would make it appear, that this real interposition of England and France, on his behalf, would not make him the farther from peace, but on the contrary; and that we should not see any other foundation for this treaty of peace, than the treaty of Roschfield, and this, said the French ambassador, guaranteed by all the mediators. I desired him, that he would again write to his master, to take care, that his fleet be not in some hole, so as to be in an incapacity, as the winds may be, to join with his highness's fleet, as the Dane's was with the Holland's this last fight. You will perceive by the inclosed, that the 4000 men are ordered to go hence under the convoy of only 4 men of war; and that Opdam was to meet them with only 12 men of war; and I have desired

Mr. Appleboom to give his master notice thereof, and that he have a diligent eye upon the motions of the Holland fleet, lest, upon some notice, which may possibly some way or other come to them, they should endeavour separately to fight his highness's fleet. And as to the sending of these 4000 men, I can only say, that yet it's not stopp'd, but all possible haste used therein; and the Brandenburg and Danish ministers do vehemently press the going of it; but when it shall be known, that his highness's fleet is gone, they will hardly think four ships a sufficient convoy for them. Besides, it hath been a great snow and frost yesterday and to-day, so that men begin to be in an apprehension of the Sound's freezing. De Witt said, that a grave burgo-master of one of the towns of North-Holland, who is now here, told him yesterday, that if this weather hold, the Sound will certainly be very suddenly frozen, and that himself did once cross the Sound upon the ice the first of December, N. S. I did send you the foundation of the instructions, upon which the embassy to the duke of Muscovy was to be founded, to wit, to persuade him to make peace with Poland, and war with Sweden; and if it go forward, I shall endeavour to give you a further account of it. Between this and the next post, we shall, I suppose, be able to judge, which way the states of Holland, and consequently the states general, will resolve; they are now in a great streight. The truth is, they would give the law to all Europe, and not receive it from any, and have England, and France, and every body else, steer after their compass; and their north pole is their traffick, measuring all things only by that, without any other considerations whatsoever, and in the which they are not willing any body else should have the least share; and this trade of the East Sea is one of their greatest mysteries in trade, they venting there what they bring out of the east, south and west; and again, supplying other countries with the commodities of that sea: Poland alone spent more pepper than all the rest of Europe; and by this backing the king of Denmark, and bringing down the king of Sweden, they thought to make themselves absolute masters of that sea; and although their Spanish, and East-Indy and Spanish trade, be richer, yet the destroying of this trade is also the destroying of those other; and besides, the commodities of the East sea, being bulky, did employ numbers of ships and seamen, so that the failure thereof will make them inconsiderable in both.

As for Gluckstadt, when the Danish ministers made their desire of borrowing money, and did proffer Cronenburg-castle, and other things, for security, the deputies of the states general asked them, if they had not power to proffer Gluckstadt; and when the council of state were ordered to give their opinion, whether it were fit to send the 4000 men before winter or not, they gave as their opinion, that it was fit to send the 4000 men, but that it was fit to send 2000 to Gluckstadt; whereas the Danish ministers desired only the sending of provision, not of men, to Gluckstadt, but that all the men might be sent to Copenhagen. I am,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Hague, the $\frac{2}{22}$ Decemb. 58.

Your most faithful humble servant,

G. DOWNING.

I pray that Mr. de Bordeaux's packet here inclosed be sent to him speedily, it being sent from Mr. de Thou here; as also the other, to the lord general Fleetwood, from Mr. Appleboom.

I find that great sums of money have been given by the ^{king of Denm. ministers} 537 381 393 140 466 131 of the k. of Poland.
140 to divers 408 468 538.

I pray your thoughts at the ministers as to the Hague, as to the settling the 150l. per annum; and in the mean while for the last quarter.

I had very much adoe to gain the French ambassador; and I doubt you will not firmly carry France with you in this businesse, if it come to difficultye, unlesse you assure them, that you will also help in making the peace also for Poland, so as with the exclusion of the house of Austria; and truly I take it also to be your interest; and if this state find France any thing inclining to their way of a general peace, they will be very troublesome. I know not how they may be; however, I am sure they are full of anger.

Vol. xii p. 321.

My LORD,

I KINDLY thanke your honor for the favour I received from Mr. Fawbanks by your order, wherewith I have a little pacified those, to whom I am indebted since my coming over; but perceiving your occasions are so great, that I cannot have the honor to confer with you, and my owne condition so lowe, that I am not able longer to subsist, and maintaine my family; therefore I humbly beseech you to take into consideration these followinge brief propositions, and lett me receive some answere, that I may knowe what to relye upon.

If his highnes the lord protector wil be pleased to receive me unto his grace and favour, trust, employ me, and put me in some condition fitt to serve him, it shall be my utmost endeavour really to doe his highnes considerable service; and if uppon triall I faile, either in faithfulness, or in want of abilitie to performe what I promise, his highnes may dispose of me at his pleasure.

If this be thought not fittinge;

Then my humble suit is, that I may have the benefitt of such part of my estate, as is not yet disposed of; and I shall confine myselfe into some part of the kingdome, where I am least knowne, and may live most privatly, ingaginge myselfe never to act, or so much as speake, of state affaires.

And if this will not be graunted,

I most humbly intreat, that I may have free libertie to acquaint my friends, and those that have formerly knowne me, with my present condition, implore there helpe and assistance for imployment of my children, and my owne subsistence; and that nether myselfe for desiringe, nor they for assistinge, may receive any blame or harme: provided alwaies there be nothing asked or said prejudicial to his highnes or the present government. I dare inlarge no further for feare of beinge troublesome, but shal be ready to answere any thing, that may be objected; and ever remaine,

MY LORD,

November 22d. 1658.

Your most humble servant,

JOHN MARLAY.

Resolution of the states general touching admiral Opdam's return, &c.

3d December, 1658. [N. S.]

Vol. lxii p. 282. BEING again put to deliberation, what order should be sent to admiral Opdam touching the security of the 4000 men to go for Denmark, and the ships that are to return home; it hath been resolved, that letters shall be written to the said admiral; that their high mightinesses think fit to advertise him of two things to be considered: first, that the said 4000 men, that are to go to sea the 7th instant, if the season will permit, may be received and conveyed securely. 2dly, That he return home with those ships, that are not to winter in Denmark. Therefore it is put to his consideration, that if the forces of Sweden are very considerable in the Sound, to stay and receive these forces between Flekero and Schagen, or thereabouts; and to convey them to Copenhagen, with the ships, that are to winter there; and if the Swedish fleet be not so considerable, then that he come home, as soon as he can, giving order to the ships, that stay behind, to convoy carefully the said forces to Copenhagen: yet that this is not wrote by their high mightinesses as an order, but only as advice; so that he may do as he shall think best, to arrive to the two aforesaid aims; and this resolution shall be sent to the admiralty of Amsterdam, to serve them for information.

Your LORDSHIP's very humble servant,

GEORGE MONCK.

Captain Langley to secretary Thurloe.

MY LORD,

Leith, Nov. 23. 1658.

HERE hath been little of importance, which together with my want of health kept me from writing to your lordship some posts by-past, all things being at present, like the season of the year, frozen and dead in outward appearance: only the Quakers make a great bustle here, still prating out their idle stories, Yorkshire and those parts adding daily new fewel to there fier, here being lately come two new ones thence, to declare they have many vain disputes with the free-willers so called. But all I can observe from them, that is new, is, that they do not like this protector soe well as the last, but will give noe reason for it.

The Scotts continue as malignant as ever, hoping for redemption, as they call it. The present good and happy settlement of the present government nothing moves them to alter from their dark principles. The leopard cannot change his spots. The Anabaptists, in deep silence, still seem to take no notice of the weal or woe of the present times. Their words nor actions leave no tract for present as formerly, which makes me think they are out of design at present. Yet some of them still sadly complain, that they have been outwitted; so that at present in these parts it seems to be falling water with both them and the Quakers, their designs and all their other endeavours being altogether fruitless, and I hope will so continue. Those that formerly halted between two opinions, not baptizing their children, making ready to, but did not outwardly join with the Anabaptists as to their discipline, are now come in to Mr. Collings, who was some 14 days past ordained pastor of a new-gathered church here, by 6 ministers that came from Newcastle and thereabouts, of which Mr. Haman was chief; since which time most of their grown children are baptized by Mr. Collings. This church encreaseth something, but the others nothing.

Sir, here hath been lately 10 ships taken by the St. Peter frigytt of East-end, who plyes the Staples coast constantly. When he is out, and doth much mischief, all ships being forced to keep off at sea, to sail clear of those rocks; then he lies so, that he may get sight of them, and keep always, or for the most part, out of sight of land. He plied there 6 weeks, and carried away 10 masters to East-end, whose ships he compounded for to have such sums of money paid before the masters have liberty. His best prize was one of 8 guns, three quarter mine. He killed in her 2 men, and shot a young woman, that was passing, and big with child, all to pieces. This is a sad loss for me after many others. Truly, Sir, one frigot to lye off these rocks constantly would save all this harm, if but one of 16 or 20 guns. I had not troubled your honour with this, but that I hoped you might prove instrumental towards preventing the like for the future.

Sir, wheat is at present to be had at 32 to 35 R. per quarter. It's thought 'twill be dearer. Biscuit may be had at present at 16 s. per cent. Beef and pork good at 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ per pound, if you should need any for D. R. Here is fallen such a snow, as hath not been seen this many year so early in the year: but I shall trouble you no longer, only wish I could serve your honour and my country in something more acceptable than these poor endeavours of,

SIR,

Your lordship's cordial and most humble servant,

TIMOTHY LANGLEY.

The last time I spoake with generall Monck, I told him, that your lordship would take care to gett the businesse don according as my lord Disbrowe had desired. He then promised mee, hee would writ that night to your honour, and in these words: The business my lord Disbrow writ to you about will do well, because his secretary should not take notice; but I repent me for reminding him of it; for by the sudden execution of the business it was to my cost. He promis'd Mr. Fleetwood should mis of a commission for captain Forth. I hope hee could not . . . you.

Secretary Thurloe to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

A.D. 1658.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburn.

NEITHER are the Irish letters come this weeke, which doth somewhat disappoint his highnesse as to his intention of sendinge the messenger my last promised, who is yet here, and we knewe not but that your excellency's next letter might occasion somethinge to be further sayde to you upon the subject the messenger is sent upon; but seeinge it is so fallen out, that wee have had noe letters these 3 weeks together, the sendinge to your excellency shall noe longer be delayed; but the person, who goes, shall depart to-morrow or upon thursday at furthest; and I hope he shall bringe with him the instructions to the councell, wherein noe alteration is yet made, nor I hope will be, though I can undertake nothinge therein now; but I spake of these and some other things unto Dr. Petty, who I suppose will write more at large, and the aforesayd messenger will come to your excellency foe fully instructed in all things, which relate to affaires here, that I shall not trouble your excellency in any thinge of that nature by this.

The funeral of his late highnes was solemnized this day with very great honour; but, alas! it was his funeral. Much endeavour there hath been to blowe the coale amongst the fouldiers to have begotten some disturbance this day; but, blessed be God, all is ended with peace, and things carryed in great order. There is yet noe further newes come from Sweden. Our fleet went out of the Downes towards the Sound upon wednesday last; but I feare they are not farre onwards of their journey, the windes haveing beene contrary ever since friday. This is all from

I hope you will favour him in: his name is 43 21 7 18 16 5 22.

Dr. Thomas Clarges to Henry Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

THERE is little farther from the Sound then came in the last account, but some say the Hollanders lost four ships, and their vice-admiral's and rear-admiral's persons, and had twelve ships disabled; but neverthelesse, it is not by any contradicted, that Copenhagen is reliev'd, which may much disturbe the king of Sweden's enterprizes, and his misfortunes may be increas'd by the delay of our fleet, which was goeing, as I am privately inform'd, under vice-admirall Goodson to those parts, and is now winde-bound in Yarmouth-roade.
 The Holland ambassador is very apprehensive of our interposition in these transactions, and thinks his masters glory will be much eclipsed, if they ruine not the Swede fleet, and hinder their attempts in the Sound, which nothing can prevent (as he thinks) but our aide.
 I dare not pretende to so much state knowledge as to give my poore judgment in these great matters; but certainly those eastern parts will be the scene of important action and great consequences. This day his late highness funerall was solemnised; the manner whereof I have written to the lords of the council, being unwilling to renew your excelen-cie's affliction with a narrative of such a nature. I am,

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

London, this 23^d of Nov. 1658.

Your excellencie's most humble servant,

THO. CLARGES.

Resolution of the states of Holland.

Vol. lxi. p. 341.

THE counsellor and pensionary hath reported the considerations and opinions of the deputies of their most noble mightinesses for the affairs of Poland, who have examined, according to the 8th of October last, the contents of the memorials and propositions of the Sieur Pinocci, envoy of the king of Poland, made to their high mightinesses, and to their commissioners, and put in writing, where they have observed these points considerable:

First, Whereas in the negotiation touching the evacuation of Prussia for a sum of money, which the French ambassador had proposed some while since in the name of the king of Sweden, that this satisfaction might be done without great prejudice to the crown of Poland, to wit, by consenting to the king of Sweden's raising of customs in the Baltic sea, upon the merchants of the king of Poland, according to what was practised in the year 1629; that the said king of Poland shall be fully informed of the intentions of their high mightinesses, that the peace may be concluded, and also an accommodation to the contentment, and according to the interest of his friends.

Secondly, Seeing that the said king of Poland is already engaged by treaty for the defence of the kingdoms and states of Denmark, and of the elector of Brandenburg, his majesty is also ready to make a defensive league with their high mightinesses for the conserving and maintaining the navigation and commerce of the Baltic sea.

Thirdly, That the city of Dantzick coming to be besieged, his majesty requires for this reason, that it may please their high mightinesses to assist the said city with a considerable fleet.

Fourthly, That his said majesty would willingly understand, what their high mightinesses will do to maintain the king and crown of Denmark against these oppressions, to the end that the said envoy may discover also the intention of the king his master.

Finally, That a day being again set for a meeting at Braunsburg, there to treat a peace between Poland and Sweden, his majesty desires to understand speedily, if their high mightinesses will be concluded in the same treaty as confederates of his majesty, or if they will be there only as mediators. Whereupon, after deliberation, it hath been resolved, that in behalf of the states of Holland, endeavours shall be made with the states general, that upon the said points answer shall be made to the said envoy as followeth.

Upon the first, That it would greatly displease their high mightinesses, that there should be new customs raised upon the Baltic sea, as this intention hath sufficiently appeared in the year 1656; and therefore they promise themselves, that the king and kingdom of Poland will by no means give thereunto their consent, or give the least occasion of the same.

Upon the second and third of the said points, that their high mightinesses have made a treaty the 10th and 12th of July, 1656, as well with the minister of the city of Dantzick, as with the Sieur de Bye, the Poland resident here; and that with intention to conserve the navigation of the Baltic sea, and the city of Dantzick, and prevent all new impositions, whereof the ratification could not hitherto be obtained; and if the said envoy hath power to deliver the said ratification, that their high mightinesses will not fail in such case to defend the said city of Dantzick and the king of Poland, adding thereunto, that their high mightinesses judge, that this ground being laid, there will easily be agreements upon other aims and interests on both parts.

Upon the fourth, That their high mightinesses have evidently made appear by real proofs, both by the sending a great fleet of ships of war, and relief to the king of Denmark, that they are resolved according to the treaty, with all their power, to deliver the said king from the oppressions of his enemies, wherewith he is at present overwhelmed; hoping that his majesty's other allies shall be the more encouraged by their example to do the like.

And upon the fifth point, That their high mightinesses, being advertised of the progress of the said assembly, will not fail to send thither their ministers, with such orders and instructions, as in such a time shall be thought expedient to advance a peace in the northern parts.

SIR,

A.D. 1658.

I HEARE that Mr. Gott is in the paper for sheriffe of Suffex, who is a petitioner for his discharge. He is a barrister at law, and now reader of an inn of chancery for Gray's inn. I hope these causes may prevayle with his highnes. If he be discharged, be pleased by a messenger to lett him know as much. He will be certainly of the next parliament; and it will be a greate obligation to him. Sir, I rest

In the possession of the right hon. Philip lord Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain.

Your most affectionate servant,

OL. ST. JOHN.

General Fleetwood to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

DEARE BROTHER,

I AM fearfull it must be still my portion to lye under your jealousyes, as a guilty person of the last weeke's intelligence from hence, in relation to your coming over; concerning which I was as unknowing as my child till afterwards, that my cosen Fayrcloath told my wife of the staying the litter, and my lord Russell acquainting me with the occasion of it. But I am so cleare in this thing, that I shall not pleade any thing by way of apology, I needing none.

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburn.

I am not without the hopes, that if the Lord sees it good to bring us together, that we shall better understand each other, then to admitt of any such suggestions or jealousyes to be received by us. I think it is our duty and interest to have a hearty love one to another; and if the Lord will but please to give us that frame, it will be, I trust, a blessing, which we shall both have cause to rejoyce in. I hope, in this, my lord Russell will give a true account of what he finds. We have no account from our fleet, but that on thursday they sayled by Yarmouth, and hade a good winde till fryday night, and then the winde turned against them. Whear they are now, we heare not; but hope they may be a good part of their way. Here is a report of a second fight 'twixt the Dutch and Sweed, but no certainty. I shall only add this, that I having now deceived some in the expression of a forwardnes for your coming, which will be suddenly, I may as well hope to undeceive you in many reports, which I canot but beleive have bine very unworthy, in a right understanding of which is the desire of

Nov. 24. [1658.]

Your most affectionate brother, and humble servant.

Mr. John Barwick to king Charles II.

May it please your MAJESTY,

I ACCOUNT myself very unhappy in those many rubbs I have met with in a busines, wherein I had reason to think myself so deeply concerned. Your majesty received the first account of it (but that only verbally and generall) from Mr. Davison. Since that time I had address'd a more particular account of it to him, but retrived it again upon the first notice of his untimely death; and since that I dispatched a third, which I took the boldness to address to your majesty imediatly, and inclosed it in a letter to Mr. Thornton: and though, I perceive, he missed of it, by reason of his coming over hither about the same time, yet I hear the packet was received by one Mr. Bovie; and I hope it is long ago arrived at your majesty's hand. And out of that confidence I shall only presume to give your majesty an account of what passed since that letter, in relation to that busines, setting aside all unnecessary repetition of what went before.

In the possession of Joseph Radcliffe, of the Inner Temple, esq;

It was the desire of Mr. D. that the money might be sent 100 l. after another; and that upon notice of the receipt of the first, a second might be sent; and that the bill might be consigned to Mr. Isaac White, and the money received in his name: but the first 100 being demanded and received in Mr. D.'s name, made such a noise among the English merchants there, as eccho'd hither, which compell'd Mr. Gregson for his own security to remand back 200 more, which lay there in his correspondent's hand; and the rather, because hereby we may put it into a more privat way of coming to your majesty's purse, without any man's taking notice of it, which was very much desired by the person, of whom I received, and whereupon I had passed my promise to use my utmost endeavours. But however, to supply your majesty's privat purse for the present, Mr. Gregson (immediatly

A.D. 1658. before I came up to London) payd 100 l. of what he had in cash, to Mr. Thornton, to be returned to your majesty, according to the order your majesty sent by him; and this I hope your majesty hath received before this time.

For the rest, your majesty will receive it with what convenient speed may be by this bearer, who hath received 100 l. already, to be returned upon his own account, and to whom the bills for the rest will be sent as soon as Mr. Gregson hath notice of his arrival there. The sum is near upon what my last guessed it to be, but not fully so much; for Mr. Gregson tells me, there wants in all 6 l. 15 s. in the count of what it was delivered to me for, and by mee to him. It was deposited in so many hands before it came to myne, as may make this probable; and, for myself, I can safely depose I never saw a peny of it, but only the baggs.

Beside this, I have received 250 more from another hand, which I have also committed to Mr. Gregson, to be returned in the same way. There is as much more promised by the same person the next moneth; and if it comes, I shall not fail in my duty of directing it into the same channell. Your majesty will hear more of it from my lord chancellor; for it comes to my hand immediatly, though not originally, from one, that honours him, and directed me to acquaint his lordship with it.

I have no more to add but an humble propofall, which was suggested to me by Mr. Gregson, that he conceives it a more secure and privat way of returning money, to have it payable to some foraigner then any English merchant, (if your majesty knowes any such, that will be faithfull) though it should come with the charge of 20 or 30 s. more per cent. then the other way. This reason is, because there is not much done in this way there, by any one, that is not known to all the rest. I humbly submitt itt to your majesty's consideration, and myself to your gracious pardon, for all this boldness, beseeching God so to multiply his blessings upon you, that you may attayn to your own kingdoms here, and his eternall kingdom hereafter.

November 25. 1658.

Mr. Downing to Secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Vol. lxi. p. 487. UPON monday last I wrote to you, by the frigate, that brought me the express from you, and therein inclosed to you my memorial given to the states general in pursuance of orders receiv'd from you in the said express. Upon tuesday the states of Holland began to consider it, as also that of the French ambassador, but as yet are come to no resolution thereupon. They had a mind to see what news by the post from France and England, but especially from England, the letters from whence are not yet come; so that it is not yet here known, that his highness's fleet is gone for the Sound; and though my memorial makes them have a great jealousy of it, yet that the assurance that the lord Nieuport had given them of its being to go for the south, makes them, that they can hardly believe otherwise; and that my memorial is only a rhodomontade to affright them. I had yesterday a letter from Zeeland of the 2^d instant, giving me advice, that a ship, arrived there from the Sound, reported, that they had met an English fleet of men of war about the Dogger-sand in the North sea some days before; yet so confident were the people there of his highness's not meddling in this business, that they would not believe the master; and this week it was printed in the Gazette of Amsterdam, that whereas it had been reported, that the English fleet was gone to the Sound, that the said report was not true. You will perceive by the inclosed, that upon sunday last the 4000 men were

And upon tuesday last the men were sett sail from Amsterdam for the Texel, there to be embarked for the Sound. By a letter this day from Amsterdam, it's written to me, that they do storm most extremely at the French ambassador and me, for our late memorials, but especially at me, as looking upon what the French ambassador hath said to be only words, and that nothing will follow thereupon. They say it will never be well, till they take down the English courage; and that then they shall have nobody to board and controul them at sea. The court of Holland sent their officers with an order to the printer to stop and seize upon his memorial and mine in the press, whereof the French ambassador hath made a great complaint, for that the ambassadors of this state do ordinarily print their memeorials at Paris, and so have all their public ministers ministers done here ; and the Danish and Brandenburgish ministers do daily print their papers in disadvantage of the Swede. For mine own part, I have little concerned myself in it, for that mine had the good luck to be printed, and very many of them published e'er the officers came ; they have also hindred the printing my memorial, concerning the

The talk of all men in general here is, that if his highness do meddle in this business, a war must necessarily ensue between him and this state ; for they say, they cannot nor must not quit the Dane ; and for him to make a peace upon the treaty of Roschfield, they say, is ridiculous ; for that he will only be thereby king of Zeeland and Schonen ; and those parts remaining to the king of Sweden, it will be in his power, every winter, when the Belt is frozen over, to land on a suddain, to invade and over-run him and this state, not able to help him by reason of the ice ; and that it were better for them, now they are engaged, at once to make a business of it, than to be perpetually alarmed from those parts ; and for the king of Denmark to make any separate peace with the king of Sweden, they say can in nowise be safe for him ; for that, say they, the king of Sweden hath no regard of his faith, as appears, say they, by this last business of Zeeland and the business of Courland ; and therefore, that the king of Denmark can in nowise be safe but by keeping firm and close to his allies and confederates. Do we not see, say they, how little the king of Sweden regards England and France further than to serve his own turn, in that he begun this late attempt upon Denmark, without so much as making known to them his design or the reason of it, altho' they had so lately been mediators of the peace between him and Denmark ? And upon these grounds, it is the general sense of all men here, that no particular peace ought to be hearkened to, and nothing less to be insisted upon for the king of Denmark, than the rendition of whatever hath been taken from him, by virtue of the treaty of Roschfield ; and that England and France ought not to be considered at all in this business, or hearkened unto. The day before yesterday the ministers of Brandenburg were with me, who are also much alarmed, and say that their master hath always been a friend to England, and is of the same reformed religion ; and therefore, that they hope his highness will not desert them. I told them, that it was far from him ; but on the contrary, that I had instructions, and desired to know what might be done in pursuance thereof. They said plainly, that the king of Sweden's desiring their master's ports in the Baltick sea had forced them to a league with the king of Poland, and that his way of dealing with him this last summer in refusing so much as to give his ambassador audience, had forc'd him, for his own defence, to enter into a treaty also with the emperor, in both which he is engaged, but not to ruin the king of Sweden, but only to resist his universal designs, as they called them, of rendering himself master of all his neighbours, and thereby to force him to peace upon reasonable conditions. They said also, that if his highness would meddle in this quarrell, he must take his lot as well as others ; and that this state was so far engaged, as that they did not doubt he would find enough to do ; and that they prayed God he had not cause to repent it, both upon the account of the unjustness, as they termed it, of the king of Sweden's present quarrel against the king of Denmark, and upon the account of the issue thereof ; for, said they, it cannot be expected, that the king of Denmark will adventure any more, upon the incitation of England and France, to make a particular peace with the king of Sweden. And if the consequence of the war shall be, that the king of Sweden shall be beaten, that his highness must expect share in what may ensue thereupon ; but, if the consequence shall be, that the king of Sweden, strengthened with such an addition of force as that of England shall beat the Dane, and thereby become master of the Sound, that then he will neglect England, as being able to subsist of himself ; yea, he will then become formidable to it, as having the sole disposition of the Baltick sea, and consequently of all materials for building shipping, and of those magazines of corn, and endangering the rendering himself by little and little master also of the Hans towns. I told them, that I perceived they were much afraid of the growing greatness of the Swede, but very little sensible of the danger of the growth of the house of Austria ; and that I thought they had sought a very ill remedy, for fear of the Swede, to throw themselves into the hands of the emperor to the making him master of all at last ; and that it was already reported, that the castle of Gottorp was to be garrison'd by half Brandenburgers, and half Imperialists ; and that the next step was to be the transporting of them both into Funen and Zeeland, the which I desired them to consider, if it did not nearly touch England, which hath always been, and is more jealous of the growth of the house of Austria than of the Swedes. They said, it could not be expected, that this state would desist ; but on the contrary, that England's pressing too hard might be a means to force them also to engagement with the Imperialists and Poles. Yesterday the extraordinary envoy of Poland was with me, who said, that he hoped, that his highness would not quit

A.D. 1658. his master, who with his predecessors had always been in amity with England; and that the traffick between them and England was very considerable to them both; and no reason in the world upon any account whatsoever, that should make any evil understanding between them. I told him, that his highness would be very glad to do any good offices for Poland, so as it might be without the comprehension of the house of Austria; to which he answered, that it was well known, that in all times there had been an extreme hatred in the minds of the Poles against the house of Austria: That though they had chosen several of their kings out of other countries, yet never any out of the house of Austria: That before his majesty made this present league, in which he now is, with the emperor, he endeavoured to his utmost to have made a peace with the king of Sweden; and that nothing but utmost extremity drove him to it: That by virtue of that treaty, the emperor had effectively sent 16000 men into Poland, whereof about 10 are now again out of Poland in Holstein with the elector of Brandenburg, and 4000 with his master before Thorn, and the rest in garrison in the city of Cracow; but that the castle of the said city is in the king's hands; by the means whereof, and of the townsmen, he saith, it is easy for his master to become wholly master of that place: That he hath sent an envoy to the emperor, whose principal errand is to prevent the return of Montecuculy with his forces into Poland: That the forces of the emperor now before Thorn were the single reason, that the said town of Thorn was not taken in the late storm; and to that effect shewed me his letters from Thorn, wherein it was also written, that the Imperialists before that town do give advice to the besieged of whatever is concluded in their councils of war; for that the Imperialists would not have that town surrendered, until it be first accorded, that a garrison of them shall be put into it, which the king of Poland absolutely refuseth. He said also, that his single business here is to treat an alliance with this state, that so they may be sure of a friend at sea, in case of being attacked again by the king of Sweden in Prussia; and to that end, to offer to them several privileges in their traffick, whereby they may stand in less need of the Austrians; and that the Austrians are very sensible hereof; and that upon this account, Fricquit and the Spanish ambassador here do to the utmost to oppose his negotiation, for that they would have Poland depend only upon them. He said moreover, that it was true, that a great part of the clergy were very much affected to the house of Austria, but that this was no more than what had been of a long time, and no more than what is now in France, but that the gentry continue still their aversion for them; and that the queen, who also hath great power there, doth to her utmost maintain the interest of France: That it could not be denied, but that their necessity had forced them to a league with the emperor; but that they were endeavouring to their utmost, to get quit of the Imperial forces, and that the rather, lest it should so fall out, that their king should die during their continuance in Poland, which, together with the interest of the clergy, might, he said, endanger the election of this emperor to be king of Poland; and that being once quit of them, they were at liberty then to treat of themselves; but however he said, that their treaty did oblige them no further to intermeddle between the emperor and the king of Sweden, than in relation to the assistance given to him; but that his king had nothing to do with any matters between them; and that this would no further tie up the hands of the king of Sweden against the emperor, than the king of Poland's being comprehended in the treaty of Munster, in so far as concerned the affairs of the empire, did tie up the king of Sweden's hands in relation to him. In fine, he said, that the interest and inclination of Poland being, as was notoriously known, wholly against the house of Austria, that it was the interest of England not to force them further into the hands of the emperor; but on the contrary, to have a consideration of their interest, and of the freeing them entirely from that house. He added, that he had been with the French ambassador, and given him the same account; and that whenever France shall quit Poland, that they must most notoriously quit their own interest. I thought it my duty to give you an account at large of these passages, leaving the judgment of them wholly to you.

By the last letters from St. Sebastian, it is advised hither, that they had news from the Canary islands, that the king of Spain's silver fleet was passed the Havanna, and so dayly expected also; that the English had burnt several ships laden with logwood. It hath frozen very hard here these three or four days, so that we begin to talk of the freezing up of the Sound; but notwithstanding, you all perceive by the inclosed, that to-morrow was the day intended for the going to sea of the 4000 men. As I am writing hereof, the post from England is come, with the alarm of his highness his fleet being gone towards the Sound.

De Ruyther is gone from Amsterdam for the Texell, and hath carried with him seamen for 4 men of war, which were to convoy the 4000 men for the Sound, as you will find by the inclosed, and to be met upon the way by 12 men of war of admiral Opdam's, 408 of all which advice is given to the king of Sweden.

It is imagined, that orders are given to vice-admiral Stokes, who is at Toulon, to go A.D. 1658. and meet the Spanish fleet.

The Danes are demolishing the works before Copenhagen: the king of Sweden is at Landschronen with the fleet.

I am earnestly pressed by some of the states for Dr. Goodwin's paper tendered to his highness. I pray that you will think of sending it me as soon as possible; for here is many very honest men desire to see it.

There is no resolution yet taken upon my memorial of the 30th of November, but a great wondring at his highness's fleet being gone, and what they will do there. I pray, your thoughts of the ministers here; and am,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Received 6. Decemb. 1658.

Your most faithful humble servant,

G. DOWNING.

Mr. Downing, resident in Holland, to secretary Thurloc.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

MONDAY in the evening I was at a conference with the deputies of the states general, at their request, about the English ships taken coming out of Bantam; which continued from five of the clock until after eight, in which they let me know, as by order of the states general, that my said memorial, together with the papers therewith presented, were sent to the directors of the East-India company at Amsterdam; and that they were in expectation of an answer from them in a little time; and in the mean while, that the states had commanded them to confer with me about several things relating to the said memorial. As first they said, that they had received two letters from their ambassador Nieuport, copies whereof they then offered to shew me, wherein he certifies the states, that at that time when the papers were given by Sir Charles Worsley, and the lord Strickland, concerning that business, he did ask them, whether the papers, which had by him been given concerning that business, had been considered; to which they replied, that they knew not, but that they would make enquiry; and that since having been with yourself, that you had made answer, that you also knew nothing of it, nor what was become of the said papers, but that you also would enquire; and therefore that the states thought it very strange, that such positive orders should be given to me to demand restitution and reparation again, without so much as having considered what had been said by them. To which I answered, that I could say nothing to what their ambassador had writ to them, but that I was very well assured of my own orders; and that they were positively to demand restitution and reparation; and that I had these orders from the council themselves, whereas most of my orders were only from yourself; and that the orders being from the council, that it was not to be supposed of them, that they would give orders or instructions without first considering the matter: yea, that the order itself, which I had received, did import, that the matter had been considered, committed to a committee, a report made from that committee by the lord Jones, and thereupon the order given to me to demand satisfaction and restitution. That as to what concerned your own not knowing what had been done, I was not able to give an account what discourses may have passed between yourselves, Sir Charles Worsley, my lord Strickland, and their ambassador; but that I could easily apprehend, that your sickness, and the absence of those others from the council, might make them not to know what had passed in this business; but that was but an ill argument to conclude by, that therefore the matter had not been considered, because these persons knew not of it. They objected further, that their states thought it strange, that the matter should have been put by his highness to the consideration of the court of admiralty, as if they were proper and fit persons to intermeddle in this business; whereas it ought wholly to have been done by his highness and council. I told them, that I wonder'd, that they would trouble themselves with a thing of this nature, as if his highness were not free to consider of his matter, in what way seems to him best; but in regard they had thought fit to take notice hereof, I could not but let them know, that I did find in the order, which I had from the council, that the council had it in debate, which way the business might be best and most regularly considered of; and, upon that account, did put the business into the hand of the admiralty, as who best understood matters of this kind, and were able to administer oaths in the case as occasion. And that this putting the business into the hands of the admiralty was not to put the judgment of the business into them, but only by way of examination;

Vol. lxii:

A.D. 1658. ation. And finding them press so hard upon these two points, I desired to be satisfied from them, whether the paper, which I had presented with my memorial to the states general, had been read in the states or not; or by any commissioners appointed by them, of their number, and in whose hands those papers were now: to which they answered, that they could not deny but that the said papers had neither been read in the states general, nor by any commissioners of their number; but that they were sent to the directors of the East-India company, by them to be perused, and answers thereunto to be framed by them. To which I replied, that I wondered they could complain of his highness and council, upon suspicion only of a defect, which they knew themselves guilty of; and withall desired them to consider, whether the high court of admiralty of England (persons unconcerned) or the directors of the East-India company (the persons complained of) were the fitter to have the examination of this business.

They further urged, that the states could not but think it somewhat strange to find the matter judged and determined in the said memorial before its time, it being therein termed injustice and an injury. To which I answered, that I found it so termed in my orders, and therefore that I was bound so to term it. And moreover I told them, that I did not think, that there was any precipitation or irregularity in his highness and council in so calling it; for that here was not only the fact committed, but a sentence given thereupon by their court at Bantam, to the confiscation of ships and goods, but an appeal to his highness, a transmission of the matter from him to the states general, with a demand of right, the resolution of the states general thereupon, together with all such examinations and papers as concerned this matter; so that there was before his highness the whole matter, on the behoof of the defendants; and as to the plaintiffs, that his highness had thereupon caused a full examination to be made of what was alledged by them. And upon the whole, he finds it an injury and injustice done to his subjects, and calls it so; but that I could produce them some resolutions of theirs, wherein they are pleased to qualify things with the name of injustice and wrong, having heard one side only; yet that his highness did not take any notice thereof. They said farther, that as to what seemed to be taken notice of by his highness, as if the mentioning the compleating the marine treaty in the resolution of the states general, for the restitution of the said ships, were in such a manner set down, as if implying a kind of forcing his highness to compleat the said treaty; that the said resolution was by no means to be so understood, only that it was therein set down to press the perfecting thereof, for the prevention of the like for the future. To which I replied, that his highness could no otherwise understand the meaning of the states general, then as they are pleased to express themselves; and that in the said resolution, the perfecting the said treaty is expressly set down as a condition, without which the restitution of the said ships is not to be expected; and that supposing the treaty desired to be never so just, yet that the way of coming by it was unhandsome, and of very evil consequence, such as might lay a precedent to all others, who have any thing to do with his highness, to seize themselves of the goods and shipping of his subjects, when they have a mind to gain any treaty of him. But that I thought the only fair and indifferent way in this case is first to restore and make satisfaction of what hath been unjustly taken away, and then upon indifferent terms to speak of preventing the like for the future, in case the treaty now on foot were not so particular as desired. And withal I told them, that his highness seems to have much more reason then they to press the giving of assurance, that his subjects may for the time to come enjoy their lawful traffick with the enemies of this state, as being the only persons restrained and hindered, the subjects of the United Provinces in the mean time trading freely with his enemies. A.D. 1658.

Vol. lxii. p. 277.

THERE have been again read in the assembly the letters of embassador Nieuport of the 25th, 27th, and 29th of November last, touching the English fleet going to the Sound; whereupon, after deliberation, it hath been resolved, that letters shall be written to admiral Opdam, that he shall stay with all his whole fleet in Denmark, and defend himself as well as he can, until their high mightinesses shall have further deliberated of this business, and sent him other orders, changing the resolutions of the 30th of November and 3d of December instant, with order, that he provide himself of victuals, and other things, as well as he can, in the neighbouring places, and out of the ships of the subjects of this state, who shall pass by the Sound, with promise, that all shall be restored them by the state, and letters shall be written to the severall admiralties of Holland, that they send hither speedily deputies to consult of this business concerning the sending of victuals to the fleet; and the admiralty of Amsterdam shall be required to think of expedients for this purpose, assuring them, that the 100,000 florins shall be treated on. And that this shall be written not only to lord admiral Opdam by the post, but also by the way of resident Romer at Hamburgh.

London, 6. December, 1658. [N. S.]

I HAVE received the resolution of their high mightinesses concerning the late fight in the Sound. Seventeen frigats commanded by vice-admiral Goodsonn, bound for the Sound, passed last week by Yarmouth; but the ship, wherein Sir George was with his company, was the first instant in this river. Others are making ready at Chatham, and elsewhere. I communicated to the secretary of state, that it was the resolution of their H. M. that the prizes taken from the Swedes in the last fight, as also the prisoners, should be left to the disposal of the king of Denmark, seeing that their fleet was sent thither but as auxiliaries, and only to assist the king of Denmark against his oppressors, according to the league, and to re-establish the peace in the North. Finally, I prayed him to let me have an answer to my memorials touching the two sugar-prizes here detained, and the three Bantam ships taken from the English. He answered me, that he would report to his highness what I had communicated, assuring me, that his highness would be very glad to hear of their intention to a peace in the northern parts, desiring the same himself most heartily; and that he hath and will endeavour to preserve amity with the United Provinces: that shortly I should have my answer to my memorials; and that the commanders shall come and confer with me; that the funeral of his late highness had hitherto hindered them, but that now they should dispatch all with expedition.

Sir A. Jhonston to secretary Thurloc.

MY LORD,

I WAS by your assistance restored to my place of clerk register in this nation, by a patent from his late highness for him and his successors; which being passed the great seale, is, according to our law and custome, a sufficient right and good security to enjoye the same during my lyfe, without renewing the same by his successor: but being informed, that his highness doeth renewe gifts of the lyke nature graunted by his fayther to others in this nation, I haive thairefore praesumed to trouble your lordship with this my concernement, humbly intreating, that your lordship wil be pleased to obteane his highness hand and seale to the inclosed paper, being a confirmation of my place drauen up conforme to my former gift, as will appeare from the extract thereof, as it is passed under the greate seale; and so craving pardon for this trouble in the midst of your great affaires, I remayne

Your LORDSHIP's obleiged and humble servant,

At Ed. 26 Nov. 1658.

A. JHONSTON.

I have written to my lord Fleetwood, and sent the extract to Mr. Cambel.

Inclosed in the preceding.

RICHARD, by the grace of God, lord protector of the commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereto belonging, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting. Know ye, that forasmuch as we, considering

A.D. 1658. ing that our late dearest father of blessed memory, by his letters patent and gift of the date at Westminster the ninth day of July MDCLVII. hath constituted and appointed Sir Archibald Johnston of Wariestown, knight, to be keeper of the rolls, and clerk of the registers of Scotland during the term of his natural life, with power to him to receive and enjoy all and singular the fees, profits, commodities, allowances, powers, pre-eminences, authorities, privileges, and advantages whatsoever appertaining to the said office, as fully, amply, and absolutely, as any other held, or might or ought to have holden and enjoyed the same, in and for the execution of the said office; and we having certain knowledge of the abilities, honesty, and faithfulness of the said Sir Archibald Johnston, and of our special grace being most willing to renew and corroborate the said gift and patent of our said late dearest father in favour of the said Sir Archibald; therefore we have not only ratified, approved, and for us and our successors confirmed, and by these presents ratify, approve, and for us and our successors, confirm the aforesaid letters patent and gift granted by our said late dearest father of blessed memory to the said Sir Archibald Johnston, of the date, tenour, and contents above-written, in all and sundry heads, points, clauses, articles, and circumstances thereof, dispensing with the not ingrossing of the same herein, and with all other objections and imperfections, (if any be) that may be proponed or alleged against the same, or this present ratification thereof, for ever; but also of our special grace, certain knowledge, and proper motive, we have of new assigned, constituted, and appointed, and by these presents assign, constitute and appoint the said Sir Archibald Johnston of Wariestown to be keeper of the rolls and clerk of the registers of Scotland, of us and our successors, unto him the said Sir Archibald Johnston, by himself or by his sufficient deputy or deputies, in any part of that office, for and during the term of his natural life, and to have and enjoy to him the said Sir Archibald Johnston for the exercise and execution of the said office, all and singular the fees, profits, commodities, allowances, powers, pre-eminences, authorities, privileges, and advantages whatsoever, by whatsoever means due, accustomed, or to the said office belonging and appertaining, and that as fully, amply and absolutely, to all intents and purposes, as the said Sir Archibald Johnston, or Sir Alexander Gibson, or any other or others heretofore holding and exercising the said office of keeper of the rolls, and clerk of the registers of Scotland, ever have or hath lawfully held and enjoyed the same, or might or ought to have held and enjoyed the same, in and for the exercise and execution of the said office; and gives and grants to the said Sir Archibald Johnston full power and authority to demand, receive and keep the said his rolls and registers of Scotland during his said natural life, and to demand, receive and make use of all such fees, profits and allowances as are any ways become due for or in respect of the said office, and which are yet unpaid from the twenty-fourth day of June 1657. and which shall become due for or in respect thereof during the said Sir Archibald his natural life; provided, and our meaning is, that the said Sir Archibald Johnston, his deputy or deputies, shall be subject to and observe such regulation, either in respect of fees or otherwise, as shall be from time to time made in the said office by us or our successors, by advice of our council in England. And we have granted, and by these presents grant, to the said Sir Archibald Johnston, that the aforesaid letters patent, or the inrollment thereof, shall be, in and by all things, firm, good, valid and effectual in law, to all intents and purposes, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, and so shall be construed, adjudged and taken to be in all our courts of record, as elsewhere, for the best benefit and advantage of the said Sir Archibald Johnston, although express mention of the true yearly value or certainty of the premises, or of any of them, or of any other gift or grant made to the said Sir Archibald Johnston before the aforesaid gift granted to him by our said late dearest father, is not made in this present gift or letters patent, or any statute, act, ordinance, provision, proclamation, custom or restraint heretofore had, made, set forth, enacted, ordained or provided, or any other matter, cause or thing whatsoever to the contrary anywise notwithstanding. And our will and pleasure is, that this our ratification, grant and confirmation of the said office to the said Sir Archibald Johnston be past under our great seal of Scotland; and we do by these presents authorize, command and require the commissioners of our exchequer in Scotland, and all others our officers and ministers there, whomsoever it may concern, to pass the same under our great seal accordingly; and for so doing, these our letters patent, or the inrollment thereof, shall be unto them, and every of them, sufficient warrant in that behalf. In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patent. Witness ourself, &c.

Vol. lxii. p. 355.

AS by the victory gotten by God's grace over the king of Sweden's fleet, the war between the two Northern kings hath quite another consideration, and a better way to peace than heretofore is prepared; moreover, as the king of France and the protector of England have declared themselves to be wholly inclined to contribute thereunto all their help; and that also such a way is the surest and most profitable for this state, and for the freedom of navigation and commerce; besides that, ourselves are incumbered with all princes and states making profession of the Christian religion; so that the deputies earnestly press, that the ambassador Isbrants, now with the elector of Brandenburg, and one or two of those ambassadors, that lately have been with the kings of Sweden and Denmark, might speedily be sent to the said kings, there to resume the treaty for an honourable and just mutual accommodation, and to intreat the ministers of France and England, according to what have been presented and offered by their masters, to co-operate to so wholesome and necessary work. And it will be expedient, that first the intentions of the said two Northern kings should be sounded, if the foresaid mediation and interposition of the ambassadors of this state shall be by them accepted, that so the foresaid endeavours may not only be not in vain, but also that all may proceed with the honour and reputation of the government.

Col. J. Jones to secretary Thurloc.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

THE inclosed papers were sent mee to bee delivered you. The persons concerned by a verball command of my lord Russell were committed to my lieutenant William Wray, lieutenant of the garrison at Beaumares, Samuel Hinks for divulging false newes, and Powell for abetting him, and some other uncivill demeanour in his presence.

The lieutenant informes mee, that hee hath taken bonds of them for their appearance before the councill the 10th of December next; and that hee transmitted unto you some papers concerning this matter formerly. Begging your favour for giving you this trouble, and the acceptance of my reall acknowledgment of your former favours and kind respects, much beyond the measure I received from others, I rest

Resolutions of the states general.

Monday, 8. Decemb. 5 o'Clock afternoon, [1658. N.S.]

AFTER deliberation it was resolved, to require the council of state to hold speedily a conference, and to put in writing concerning the augmentation of the state revenues and speedy means to pay off the extraordinary charges, that are of necessity to be made by sea and land, and especially to propose such means, which shall be signified to the provinces, that they may give their respective consents.

Another resolution of the same date.

LETTERS shall be writ to Helmont of the Vly and Aggens of the Texel, that they shall command the pilots and fishermen, who go daily forth to sea, that they take heed, that the fleet under command of lord admiral Opdam came not in; but if they meet them, and tell them from their high mightinesses, that they come forward, as far as the passages, from whence they set sail; and hereof to give speedy notice to the admiralty, to give such order for the entrance of the ships, considering the ice and other incommodities, according as they shall judge meet. And the admiralty of Amsterdam is required to send such orders to the said commissioners as the service of the state requires, and a copy of this resolution shall be sent to all the several seats of the admiralty, to serve them for information.

THERE being again read in the assembly the report of the Sieur Ripperda de Beurſe, and other deputies of their high mightineſſes for the affairs of Denmark; and having, according to the reſolution of the 6th inſtant, conferred with ſome commiſſioners of the council of ſtate concerning that, which ſhould be done further about the 4000 men appointed for the relief of Denmark; after deliberation, it hath been reſolved, that by an act colonel Killigrew ſhall be charged to ſend the flyboats with the ſoldiers to lie before Medemblick in North Holland; or if the ice hinder, or other let, then into the chanel of Amſtel, behind the Wering in the bay; or if that be not poſſible, then into the new chanel; yet ſo that he may make choice of the beſt of theſe places, as he ſhall judge fit by the advice of vice-admiral de Ruyter, with order to cauſe the ſaid companies to march to ſuch places in the province of Holland and Weſt-Friſeland, as ſhall be expreſſed in the patents of the ſaid provinces. And the ſtates of Holland are required to diſpatch preſently the ſaid patents; as alſo letters ſhall be written to the province of Friſeland, that they would with-hold the eight companies from ſhipping themſelves, placing them in ſea-towns, as they ſhall judge fit.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

71. ALTHOUGH we never yet had the ſhips ſent, which were appointed and eſtabliſhed for this place by his highneſs and counsell, yet I thought it my duty to give your honour what intelligence I can of the number and motion of the Spaniſh fleet in theſe parts, and rather to want this frigate, than any neceſſary advertisement ſhould be neglected. When in July laſt I underſtood the Spaniſh fleet to be in theſe parts, immediately fitted all our ſhips, and hired a private man of war for two months, (my intelligence being then but of five gallions) hoping to have made ſome conſiderable attempt upon them, and manned our ſhips with about 300 landmen. Our fleet lay between Carthageſa and Porto Bello in an obſcure place, and ſent to take priſoners, which they quickly effected, by whom they underſtood the Spaniſh fleet to be in Porto Bello to attend the plate coming over land, and ſo lay cloſe about a month, till they were forced to diſcover themſelves by chaſing two Spaniſh veſſels coming from Carthageſa to Porto Bello, who had ſo much advantage of ours in ſailing, being very clean, (which ours ſeldom are for want of neceſſaries here) that they made the harbour of Tollou, and got in; yet ours chaſed them in ſo cloſe, that they burnt their two ſhips, and notwithstanding the reſiſtance they found by a fort and eight guns, entered the town, and burnt it, being a very well built town with three churches; but that not being their buſineſs, our ſhips returned to their former ſtation, where, about the 20th of October, they ſpied the Spaniſh fleet coming from Porto Bello, all our ſhips being gone to water, except the Marſton Moore and Hector, who did what they could to attempt them, keeping in the rear, hoping to find them ſcattered, which, by the cloſe keeping of them together, they could find no opportunity to do, but were fain to reſt contented with the ſatisfaction of having paſſed a ſquadron of them, giving them their two broad ſides, and ſo returned hither. The priſoners we formerly took here did with confidence affirm, that they were to take in men at Carthageſa, and to attempt us. Wherefore I ſent a meſſenger to gain further intelligence, who returning yeſterday, informs me, that they have been gone from Carthageſa ever ſince the beginning of this month, but whether for Spain or the Havanna, we cannot tell, though in probability it muſt be for the Havanna, where their cuſtom and manner is to meet. And ſome priſoners inform us, that a fleet from New Spain, and other parts, are there to rendezvous; and it is not probable, they will venture through the gulf with ſuch a fleet at this time of the year, having had experience the laſt time of the diſadvantage, by loſing three gallions of plate, unleſs their affairs and condition at home require more than ordinary haſte. Nor doth any thing perſuade us, that they will return ſo ſoon this winter time, ſaving that one priſoner informs us, that there came an expreſs to Carthageſa from the king, that they ſhould make all poſſible haſte away; which advice happily being grounded on their ill ſucceſs and diſappointment at home, may haſten them. There were fifteen gallions and fourteen merchant-men, good ſhips, when ours paſſed through them; and the priſoners reckon as many merchant-men more, as will make up ſixty ſail, and ſay that fifteen men of war are to meet them at the Canaries to guard them. And doubtleſs they will be very wary, having four millions of the king's money, beſides merchants, viz. two already due, and two they have borrowed beforehand, finding the difficulty of coming for it, as themſelves ſay. It was a ſtrange tantalizing to us to be in the miſt of millions, and not be able to venture for it without manifeſt indiſcretion and I HOPE the messenger my last mentioned will be with you as soone, or neare as soone, In the pos-as this; and therefore I will not be longe now. Yesterday the counsell, upon his session of the highnes desire, resumed the debate of a parliament, and resolved to advise his highnes right hon. the to call a parliament forthwith. Some debate there was, wheither Ireland and Scotland earl of Shelative, and to send the like numbers, and for the same places, as formerly; and wee hope they will be of the like goodnes too, beleevinge your excellency can order that affaيرة as it seemes good unto you. I need not trouble your excellency with givinge you the reasons, which moved his highnes to call this parliament at this tyme, a thinge alwayes usuall in the beginning of every prince's reigne. The great necessities wee have for money, which cannot be supplied but by parliament; the good opinion the people in generall now have of his highnesse; besides these, there be other reasons, which are more fitt to be told your excellency by word of mouth, then by this way; and those will be communicated by the aforesaid messenger, who will be alsoe able to answere some objections, which are very obvious, as to this season of callinge it. Great striveings there will be to get in, and the comonwealth's-men have their daily meetings, disputeinge what kinde of comonwealth they shall have, takeinge it for granted, they may picke and choose; and they hope to prepare a part of the armye to fall in with them, wherein I hope they will be deceived; although I must needs say, I like not the aspect of things, and my feares are greater then my hopes. God can deliver both from the daunger and the feare of it; and I am sure it's only his worke, as our affaires are constituted. Our last newes from Denmarke was by a letter dated the 11th instant, which brought noe great newes, save that part of the two fleets of the Dutch and Swede had a new rencounter, in which the Swede lost one ship. The main fleet of the Swede is retired, not beinge able to keepe the sea, now the Dutch and Dane are conjoyned. Our fleet is still kept upon this coast by contrary windes. I remeyne

THE leagued princes manifest much zeal and generosity for the execution of their league. Those, that have been solicited lately not to set their hands to the ratification, or at least not to engage themselves too far, have not at all hearkened to what was proposed unto them, and have answered them, by the justice whereof the said league was founded, as not aiming at the offending of any one, and having no other end but the conservation of the general peace, and the particular quiet of each one interested therein, not derogating at all from the respect and authority due to the emperor, and being upheld by the constitutions of the empire, and the treaty of Munster. The said allied or leagued princes have written to the emperor and the elector of Brandenburg, and to the general Montecuculi, and prayed the two latter, that they would in this juncture of affairs give good order, that the circle of the Lower Saxony be not at all damnified nor violated by their forces; otherwise that they were resolved to put in action all means, that the law of nature and nations had put into their power to defend it, and warrant it from oppression. The emperor hath signified by letters to his electoral highness, that at his request the king of Spain had granted, that the treaty of peace, proposed some while since at Francfort between France and Spain, shall be in Germany, although that there were reasons to persist in his former resolution for the place of the treaty to be in the Pyrenean mountains, as the limits of both kingdoms. Also that the same king accepted of the mediation of the electoral college, saving also the mediation of the pope and the republic of Venice, requiring his electoral highness to contribute what in him lies to the advancing of a matter so beneficial for all Christendom. It is said, that the duke of Modena, after the death of his father, found a hid treasure to the value of 700,000 pistoles, and that he is resolved to enjoy the same in peace, and to retire himself betimes.

I HAD yours of the 28th instant. As for the letters, that came downe into these parts from Mr. Carey's man Roger Greene, are from Carey himselfe, they are usually directed to Mrs. Susan Keckwitch, who is daughter to the governor of Maues castle; she being one of Mr. Carey's converts, who hath learnt the art of Hannah Trapnell, and is oft-times in her singing trances, and soe continues 12 or 14 houres, if not longer, as I am informed by her father, who is much troubled at the same, and tells me he conseales it what he can. The letters, as aforesaid, sometymes are directed to John Barnes, or major Bauden, or Hannibal Randell of Maues (where Barnes and Keckwitch alsoe liveth). If you have a desire to meete with any of them, it will be your best way to have it done by capt. Hatfell, or the post-master of Plymouth. There is alsoe stuff of that nature comes to Abraham Chair of Plymouth; but if you have a desire to have this person I imploy to goe along with them att any place nere London, you may trust him, and he will not be mistrusted by them; for he preaches and prays oft-times amongst them, he being one that is furnished not only with parts, but confidence, to carry it on as well as any of them; which I have taken the boldness to hint to you, and leave it to your honour's consideration, and shall ever remain

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Vol. lxii p. 419.

I WRITE your honour by two severall convoyances lately, and this goes by way of the Algarves, a duplicate of which I sende to Oporto to waite an opportunity to be conveyed to your honour.

Three or fower dayes since here arryved some Jewes from Tituan in Barbary, whoe assure me, that five dayes before they came from thence, two English frigattes (of which they neither know the name of shipes nor commanders) brought into Tituan roade a gallion of 32 gunns, and a Holland ship, which the frigatts tooke under the castle of Gibraltar. The pryzes came both from the West-Indies, and are loaden with hides, cochineal, indigo, tobacco, and store of pieces of eight; and this is confirmed by capt. Middiman of of London, who came from Tangera, onely that he differs in this, that he reported the prizes to be both Hollanders, loaden for Spaniards accounts. Yesterday the lord chief justice of Portugal shewed me a letter, which he received from his brother the conde de Consenede, whoe is now generall in the frontiers, dated the 5th of this moneth, in which he writes, that by some Spaniards taken prisoners they had intelligence, that three English frigats had landed some men neer Cadiz, and fyred two small villages on the sea-coaste; on which the king of Spaine sente to Luis de Harro to sende three regiments of foote soldiers from the camp before Elvez, to guard the coaste; but Don Luis answered, that if he sente three regiments, he must of necessity raise the sledge. But I believe this is rather a story to flatter the common people, than any thinge else; for it is not likely, that Don Luis de Harro doth acquainte the comon soldiers what passeth in private betwixt the kinge and himselfe. I am writt from Cadiz, that the West-India fleete is expected there about the end of this moneth, with at least 60 millions of treasure, of which 18 millions are for the king's account. Here is a reporte, that 60 frigatts are preparinge in England, to waite their comminge. I wish there were one halfe of that number in the bay of Cadiz. Here is little allteration in our frontiers since my last. Elvez and Mouson are still besiedged, but the Spanish army is in a deplorable condition, by reason of the extreame raines, which we have lately had. Abundance dye, and many runn away. This I saw in several letters from French commanders, to whome I give more credit then to Portuguez. These people are raisinge forces as faste as they can, and aboute the begininge of January they say, they will fight the Spaniard both in the north and south of Portugall; but if the winter season doe not drive away the Spaniard before that tyme, Mouson will be losse, for they are extreame straitned allready for provisions in the towne; but Elvez is provided for eight or ten weeks longer with all necessaries, and so there is little feare of that place, if the Portugueze, which are in the garrison, prove faithful. The Lord ever blesse and prosper your honour, are still the prayers of

THE counsellor and pensionary hath made report to the assembly, that the deputies for the affairs of Sweden and Denmark have examined, according to the resolution of the 3d instant, the memorials of the ambassador of France and of the resident of England of the 30th past, about the forwarding the peace in the Northern parts; are of opinion, that the answers following should be given to the said ambassador and resident:

The states general having seen and examined the memorial of the ambassador of France, presented the 30th past to their high mightinesses, touching the war lately kindled afresh between the kings of Sweden and Denmark, and the peace of those Northern parts, after mature deliberation, have found it expedient to answer hereby to the said ambassador, that their high mightinesses are pleased with the declaration made in the name of the king his master, that his majesty is ready to contribute his endeavours with the protector of England and their high mightinesses for the forwarding of the aim proposed in the resolution of their high mightinesses of the 27th last, to wit, for the making peace in the said northern parts, their high mightinesses being for their parts inclined to the same end, and, for the advancing the mediation of the said three states, to send also speedily ambassadors extraordinary to the said kings, with orders and instructions to join with the ministers of France and England in making such propositions and endeavours to this purpose, as shall be judged by a mutual accord to be most expedient in this constitution of affairs; and, that their high mightinesses will have care, that the peace may be firm and perpetual, and to this end they will use all the precautions that shall be judged most fit.

And in answer to the English resident thus:

The states general of the United Provinces, &c. having seen and examined the contents of the memorial presented, &c. by the resident Downing, &c. touching the peace in the Northern parts, and principally of the kings of Sweden and Denmark, have, after mature deliberation, found it expedient to answer hereby to the said resident, that their high mightinesses are well pleased with the declaration made in the name of the lord protector, that his highness is ready to contribute his endeavours with the king of France and their high mightinesses for the forwarding of the aim proposed in their resolution of the 27th past, to re-establish the peace in those quarters, their high mightinesses being on their

A.D. 1658. their part inclined to this end; and for the forwarding of the said mediation of the three states contained in the said memorial, as the best way, they are resolved speedily to send ministers extraordinary to the said two kings, with order and instructions to join with the ministers of England and France in such propositions and endeavours, as shall be judged most expedient in this juncture of time to arrive to an accommodation, requiring in the mean time, that it would please his highness not to hearken to, much less to send a fleet upon the reports, that have been made, or shall be made, as if their high mightinesses should be resolved to undertake things, which might facilitate affairs, which would be no less prejudicial to themselves, than to their allies.

Whereupon, after deliberation, their most noble mightinesses have approved the said answers; and it hath been resolved, that endeavours shall be made to the general assembly, that they draw up answers to this purpose to give to the said ministers.

At the council at Whitehall.

Vol. lxii. p. 427.

ACCORDING to a former order, the council did this day take into consideration the business upon the petition of the owners of the ship Endeavour and her lading; and a report heretofore made in the case by the judges of the court of admiralty, and Dr. Walker, his highness's advocate, (whereof consideration had been taken on the 10th of June last) was again read; whereby it appears to be fully proved in the admiralty-court, that the said ship belonging to Robert Oxwicke, and other merchants of London, and being laden at Teneriff with 313 pipes of canary wine by the agents of Richard Baker and company, merchants of London, for their proper accounts, was, in her course betwixt Teneriff, and the islands of Palma, on the 21st of Nov. 1655. English style, set upon by four ships under command of one Gyles de la Roche, a Frenchman, and subject of the French king, and by them surpris'd and carried away, together with the said wine, and other her lading, the masters and mariners being also held under strict custody, and barbarously used, altho' they knew, as was by themselves confessed, that the peace betwixt France and England was then agreed upon, they pretending for the cause of such their seizure their being destitute of a ship's lading of wines for their necessary provisions, being bound upon a long voyage, and saying, that their owners or employers, viz. the marshal de Meilleraye in France, were rich and able enough, and must pay and make satisfaction to the English for the same. And it is further set forth by the said report, that they found not, that the French brought the said matter into the French admiralty, or took any examinations therein, according as the laws of France direct and prescribe; and that upon full debate and consideration thereof, and of the articles of the said peace made the 3d of Nov. 1655. N. S. and the laws of nations, the reporters are clear of opinion, that the surprisal of the said ship and lading as aforesaid was a tort and wrong and foul spoil, done contrary to the peace, and to common right; and that the said French, and their owners and principals, were liable and ought to make reparation and satisfaction to the English for the same, with costs, damages, and interest in such cases usual: and that upon full debate and consideration of the third article of the said peace, and of the letters, certificates, and other proceedings particularly recited in the said report, shewing the prosecutions and instances made in France on behalf of the English interested, as well in a way and course of justice, as by his late highness's letters both to the king of France and to the cardinal Mazarine, whereby justice was effectually pressed, and satisfaction and reparation desired, and that all diligence was therein used, and the English notwithstanding not obtaining any satisfaction, they are therefore unanimously clear of opinion, that all requisites either by the articles of peace, or laws or customs of nations, have been fully observed, so as his highness, according to the third article of the peace, which allows it, and by the rules and practice of nations (if his highness please) grant special letters of marque upon this special case to the English petitioners against the French for satisfaction of their said losses of the said ship and her lading, the value whereof, together with the damages, is sworn to amount in the whole to 12955 l. sterling, besides the value of the ship, the freight, and what was plundered from the mariners and seamen, together amounts to 3632 l. both making in all 16587 l. sterling, besides forbearance and interest. And the said matter coming to hearing before the council on the said 10th of June last, it was then, upon the grounds aforesaid, ordered, that Mr. secretary should be desired to send several copies of the said report, as well to his highness's ambassador in France, as to the lord Bordeaux, ambassador extraordinary from the king of France in England, and to accompany the same with his letters to both, representing his highness's unwillingness to issue letters of marque thereupon, till, after consideration of the matters so stated, justice should be denied or delayed to the interested; and to desire them both both to make their instance in that behalf. And whereas Mr. secretary did this day com-^{A.D. 1658.} municate to the council, that, in conformity to the said order, he had sent several transcripts of the said report to both the said ambassadors, accompanying the same with his several letters, as by the said order was directed, and that his highness's said ambassadors had made his instances accordingly: and whereas the said Robert Oxwicke and Richard Baker, and companies, have again addressed themselves by their humble petition to his highness, shewing, that all the proceedings aforesaid have proved ineffectual, the petitioners being ruined, and no reparation obtained; and therefore praying, that being worn out by tedious and long delays, and the expences they have been put to in seeking for repair, without effect, his highness will please to do them right and justice, by granting them special letters of reprisal against the French for their relief. On serious consideration of all which, and to the intent it may appear, that as his highness is willing to do justice to his people, who have suffered so great a depredation, by affording them such means of relief as the law warrants and requires, so he is desirous to proceed therein with all tenderness and respect to the French nation; his highness the lord protector, and his council, do order and declare, that letters of reprisal be granted to the petitioners, for reparation of their said losses and damages set forth in the said report, in case satisfaction be not given them by or before the first of March next, till which time, and no longer, (in case satisfaction be not made as aforesaid) the issuing thereof is to be respited and forborn; and Mr. secretary is desired to give notice hereof to the said lord ambassador Bordeaux, as also to the lord ambassador Lockhart, to the intent he may give a seasonable communication hereof to his majesty of France.

WM. JESSOP, cl. of the council.

General Monck to secretary Thurloe.

My LORD,

I RECEIVED your lordship's letter of the 23d of November; by which I understand ^{Vol. lxii. p. 431.} our first relation of the fight betweene the Swedes and the Dutch is nott soe as was reported heere; but I am very glad to heare, that the Swedes have gott the better of itt. I am sorry to heare, wee have sent a fleete this winter-time to the Sound. I doe not see what service they can doe; besides these short dayes, itt is a dangerous coast, and may bee very dangerous to them, because of the great quantity of ice, that comes downe those seas. I am sorry the soldiers should petition for 3 d. a day more, now monie is soe scarce; but you shall nott neede to doubt any thinge of the like nature from hence, though wee are further in arreares than his highness's armies in England and Ireland; but all that wee desire is, that wee may have equall share of monies with them, according to the number wee have, as itt comes in, and hope wee shall suffer with as much patience as any of them. For newes here is none; onely I heare, there is one lieutenant-collonel Patrick Hay, that goes by the name of captain Rosse, who is a tall, lusty man, with a brown head of haire, and is constantlie to bee found with the lord Sinclair, prisoner in Windsor-castle. If you could light uppon him, and apprehend him, wee have enough against him; and I am confident hee goes often to Charles Stuart, and holdes correspondence with him. I remayne

Your LORDSHIP's

Dalkeith, 2d. Dec. 1658.

Very humble servant,

GEO. MONCK.

Mr. Downing, the resident in Holland, to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

SATURDAY last my lord Nieuport's son delivered his letters, copies whereof I have ^{Vol. lxii. p. 445.} herein inclosed. He came over to Dunkirke, and passing between Nieuport and Ostend with a Spanish trumpeter, was set upon, plundered, and soundly beaten; and the effects will shew, what influence the sending of his highness's fleet towards the Sound hath wrought. The 4000 men were actually on ship-board, and the wind as fair as could blow to carry them out; and had you not sent me those orders, which you did by the frigate, the men had been gone ere they could have come by the post; but the giving in of my memorial, together with that of the French ambassador, wrought so far, as they would not suffer them to go to sea, until that they had heard from my lord Nieuport; and understanding from him, that the fleet was actually gone, they have since caused the men to be set on

A.D. 1658. shore in North-Holland and Friezeland, where they are dispersed into several towns; whereas before the certainty, that the fleet was gone, it was the talk of every man, that maugre what had been or could be said, the men should go for the Sound. And you will conjecture easily, that the stopping of these men must necessarily have a very great influence upon the elector of Brandenburg and king of Poland; for that they did build upon it as a certainty, that this state would not by any means be drawn from continuing the sending of succours to the king of Denmark, without which, they know, they can do but little. Upon monday I went to the president of the states general, to demand an answer of my memorial concerning this business, and also concerning the English ships taken in the East Indies; and yesterday Mr. de Witt gave me a visit, and assured me, that before the states of Holland do separate, which will be about the end of the next week, they will take a resolution concerning that memorial concerning the ships taken in the East Indies; and for the other, that it was now in consideration; and that he did not doubt I should have it within a day or two, if not before the going away of the post, which he doubted could hardly be; and that it was drawn up to this purpose, that the states were willing to join with England and France in endeavouring a peace between the kings of Sweden and Denmark. And as to what was alledged of reports, as if they had taken any relation, or given any orders to admiral Opdam to assist the transporting of any Imperial troops into any of the isles of Denmark, that it was not so; to which I answered, that we knew very well what their orders were, to wit, to be assisting in the transporting of the troops in Holstein, under the command of the elector of Brandenburg, which were in conjunction with the Imperial troops, and went under the name of the Imperial army; and that their order was not restrained to the transporting only of such troops as were the elector's, but that thereby the elector was left at liberty to transport which he would; and that in whatever the elector undertook, it was evident, that he still made use of an equal number of the emperor's forces; all which he confessed to be true. I pressed him, that their answer might be couched in express terms, as was my memorial, to denote their intention of endeavouring that peace in a separate way; to which he answered, that that could not be, not only in regard of the king of Poland, but especially of the elector of Brandenburg, whose influence was very great upon the provinces; but that they hoped it should be couched in such terms, as would let his highness understand, that they would be for the making a peace between Sweden and Denmark, without the others, if they would not upon reasonable terms be comprized; and that to this end they would pitch upon their embassadours. There is one Van Horn of Amsterdam, who is in nomination, and it is supposed, that some one of Zealand, or rather of Frize, will be joined to him; but nothing herein is yet concluded. Some say, that Mynheer Dorp, who was lately embassadour to the king of Sweden, will be one; but there is no talk of sending Beuninghen, who was late embassador at Copenhagen. We have had all this last week continual frost, and much snow; so that men run every-where upon the ice, and talk much of the Sound's being frozen. It hath snowed much this last night; but the wind is now come to the westward, and it begins to thaw. We hear nothing concerning his highness's fleet, since what I wrote you word in my last of their having been met about the Doger-

what are Goodson's instructions, and

Sand; and here is great enquiring, 491 213 40 317 138 412 139 343 207 158 60 whether they will attack Opdam.

32 468 168 503 231 530. The letters from Lubec, 'as you will perceive by the inclosed, speak of the harbour of Landschronen being barred up, by sinking ships in the mouth of it; so that thereby it will be impossible for the king of Sweden's ships to get out, and so that his highness's fleet will have no body to join with; but as yet there are no letters hereof come to the states. I hope vice-admiral Goodson will not put into any such places, where he may be stopt in, nor yet in case he should stay in the Sound this winter, in Wismar, or any such other place, where, by the favour of the frost, the enemy may come on a suddain on his ships, and burn them. It is apprehended, as if the king of Sweden will be unwilling to admit this state as mediators; and upon that account the overture in our memorials is somewhat the rather taken hold of, whereby, if a peace be and if otherwise, that they will so made, they shall come in; 207 67 46 112 468 132 502 138 40 467 468 169 503 couch their resolution,

You will perceive by the inclosed, that great preparation is making for the transporting of the Imperial troops into Zealand. I never took more pains in a private business than in this, wherein I have had so much ado, as is hardly imaginable; such is the interest of the East-India company here. I am,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Three letters of the ambassador Nicuport, of the 13th Dec. [1658. N. S.]

THE commissioners Wolseley, Strickland, and Thurloe, with Jessop secretary of the ^{Vol. lxii.} council, came to my house, and Monf. Wolseley told me, that some time past some ^{p. 437.} papers had been put into my hands, touching the three ships taken at Bantam; and after a memorial given, that his highness and his council had examined all things, and commanded to give me the depositions and attestations taken before the admiralty, with another writing, which comprehends clearly the intentions of his highness and council, who expect, that their high mightinesses shall give such order, that the tenor of the said writing be put speedily in execution. I answered them, that the company of Holland had not yet time to give in their answer; and that they ought to be heard in their defence. Whereunto the secretary answered, that the council had examined and considered all, that the proceedings at Batavia were very unjust, and that his highness expected reparation from their high mightinesses; and that some articles of the peace were broken. I answered, that the business, being examined without prejudication, would be found conformable to the laws observed in all places, until by a treaty marine it shall be otherwise provided; wherefore their high mightinesses have so much pressed the same to be concluded, judging, that it was necessary to prevent all disorders and complaints; that it was true, that since the peace there has been more moderation therein upon the coasts of Spain, than accord-

A.D. 1658. according to the ancient laws; but that the governors and counsellors of Holland in the East-Indies knew nothing thereof; and with many other reasons, that the business ought not to be so taken. I also demanded, if they had considered of my late memorial touching the proofs and complaints on both sides. The secretary answered, that it was not needful. Also I asked touching the sugar prizes. Whereto he answered, that in two or three days I should have answer thereof; but that now he had order only concerning the three Bantam ships; and rising up, said, that it was an abuse, and that his highness would grant letters of marque; yet that he had rather have reparation by more mild means.

Another letter from the same.

I SEND daily to the secretary to have answer of my memorial. I understand, that the ministers of Sweden have received commissions from the king their master against the king of Denmark, and the United Provinces. One, that is making ready a ship upon this commission, told me, that the commissions are only against the king and subjects of Denmark and Norway; and that the king of Sweden had not thought fit to give out any against the United Provinces; but that there is a general clause in them, which saith, against the king of Denmark, and all the enemies of the king of Sweden.

'Tis thought, that those, who take these commissions, will fall upon others in their way. I understand, this week captain Green, an old and famous caper, hath equipped a ship with a Portugal commission on the West of England, to rob the subjects of the United Provinces. I will acquaint the commissioners therewith, to the end it may be hindered.

Another letter from the same.

THE fleet of this state making sail for the Sound, being come to the point of Flemish-burg, have found the wind so north-west, that several of them have lost their masts and yard, in so much that they are returned to Solebay on the coast of Suffolk; and the wind continuing, it stays there, and the river being already frozen, 'tis thought they will have other orders. The Maidstone frigate, and the Swedish ship, wherein Sir George Ascue, and his officers and seamen, as also the Sieur Dowalt, resident of the king of Sweden, should have embarked themselves, are still there. The 9th instant the resident of Florence, and the envoys of Bremen and Dantzick, had audience of the protector, and, after the compliments of condoling and congratulation, presented their credentials. This week his highness published an ordinance, that forasmuch as he had received complaints from several parts, that several godly ministers, that endeavour to advance reformation according to the settlement, are hindered therein by those, who detain their tythes, and others, which sue them, because they refuse to admit to the sacrament all sorts of men, hath resolved, with the advice of his council, to injoin all persons, and command them in their parishes, to pay their tythes and other rights, which are ordained for their maintenance; and no man hinder them of that liberty granted them by the remonstrance and advice of the last parliament; and his highness declares finally, that his intention is to advance as much as he can the said reformation, and will employ his authority for the defence of the said ministers, which are engaged therein. I understand, that the protector, with the advice of his council, hath resolved to call a parliament of two houses, as the late king did in the year 1640. The lady of the protector is gone to Hampshire, to visit her father Mr. Major, who is sick, and to bring his son from thence to Whitehall; and the lord Henry is shortly expected here from Ireland.

Resolution of the states of Holland.

Vol. lx. p. 441.

AFTER mature deliberation, it hath been resolved, that upon good considerations reasons, that the vacant places of the captains, lieutenants and ensigns amongst the forces sent to Denmark, or shall be sent, shall not be supplied by their most high mightinesses, nor by their deputies, till their return into this country, and till knowledge and due information of the behaviour of each one, unless for some reasons other resolution should be hereafter taken. And if in the mean time some of the said companies of this province should come to be quite unprovided of all officers, and for the prevention of the inconveniencies, which may result therefrom, charge shall be given to colonel Puchler, who commands the said forces, to give the command thereof to some one of the officers that are in pay in this province, who shall be there present, with the title of commander, till further order, whereof an account shall be sent to the said colonel Puchler.

Extract of the register of their mighty lordships the states general.

Vol. lxii. p. 443.

THERE having arrived already several inconveniencies, and for the future many other may possibly happen between those of the English nation and the inhabitants of the United Provinces, because the affairs of the marine have not hitherto been well regulated, as is convenient; after consideration thereof, it is thought good, and resolved, that it be represented to the resident Downing, that as their lordships are assured, that as well the lord protector of England, Scotland, &c. as their lordships, shall be glad to prevent the like inconveniencies, their lordships do find it reasonable, that to that end be agreed, on the one part and the other, the points and articles heretofore drawn up in writing, and comprised within the resolutions of their lordships of the 23^d July last, and that thereby in general the two states, and with them also the subjects of each, may at last be put in quiet in those parts, and kept within their duty, by a good regulating of the affair marine, which is that, which their lordships do infallibly expect from the sincere inclination of his highness for the entertaining of a good amity and correspondence between the subjects of each, for the prevention of all inconveniencies between them.

Sir John Marlay to secretray Thurloc.

MY LORD,

ISENT your honor a letter with some propositions; but having hard nothing from you, I humbly begg pardon to add a word more, viz. that if your great and urgent affaires will not permit to give me any speddy answere, yet I am confident (if I may obtaine your favour and assistance) the free tendring of my service, and my reall desire and intention to performe the same, will move his highnes graciousslie to give order to helpe me with one hundred pounds more than I have had, which will inable me to pay such debts, as I have contracted since my comming over, put myselfe, wife, and children in cloths, and make us able to subsist, untill such time as his highnes shall think fitt to take me and my humble desires into his further consideration. This request is not great, and will for ever oblige me faithfully and cordially to serve his highnes, and encourage others to follow my example. I have made my addressees onely to your honour, both by myselfe and friends. I beseech you lett me finde your favour and respect, and undervalew me not so much, as to thinke me not worthie answeringe; and uppon my credit and reputation, I will so carry myselfe in all my actions, as that your honor shall never receive blame, nor have cause to thinke you have done amisse; but alwaies to esteeme me as,

MY LORD,

My lord, hearing there wil be a parliament call'd shortly, and having some reason to believe you may have burgessees presented for Newcastle not fre from beinge factious and turbulent, which I thinke may be prevented, and have chosen whom you think fitt; I have made bold to acquaint your honor herewith; and if my interest in that place can do any service heerein, you may commaund

General Fleetwood to Henry Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

A.D. 1658. DEARE BROTHER,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburn.

WE are now com to a resolution concerning a parliament, whearin if the Lord please to appeare in owning of us by his presence, we shall have cause to rejoyce. The necessity of our affayres leads us to this choyce. Ther will be 30 for Ireland, and 30 for Scotland. This buyshes hath taken up some time, which hath retarded somewhat that, which is previous to your coming over, which shall be endeavoured to be put to a speedy issue, in which my ladye's condicion must be considered; but of this Mr. secretary will, I presume, give you an account; and I hope we shall both, when we meet, deceive the expectation of others, which I desire our hearts may be up to the Lord for. I understand you have sent a letter to his highnes about your condicion for want of monyes. I wish we could helpe you; but I doe not see which way we can doe it, untill the parliament supplyes our condicion, which is in extremity of want. All that I could find from the treasurer's to move for you was the 14,000l. which was more intended for a supply to keepe up the English coyn amongst you, then in answer to what the necessity of your forces doth want. Ther is nothing, which concerns, that I shall, I hope, be found neglectfull of my serving of you, which lyes in the power of

Your most affectionat brother, and humble servant,

CHA. FLEETWOOD.

Secretary Thurloe to Henry Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELENCYE,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburn.

I AM very much afflicted to finde by yours of the 24th of November, that your distemper is renewed. I trust God will restore you to a better state of health, and give you strength to goe through the many difficulties, which your excellency, and all others, who are imbarckt in this cause, are like to goe through, and to meet with. And truly, my lord, I am greatly greived and troubled at the last clause in your letter, to witt, that you have little encouragment from what I writt in my last to write of buisness, wondring what should fall from my pen, that should occasion your excellency soe to judge. I am certeyne, that next the glory of God, I have intended nothinge more, then to doe and write that, which may be for your service. My judgment may be erroneous, beinge in all things very weake; but I am sure, noe man hath a truer heart towards you and your affaires than I have. But it haveinge pleased your excellency not to instance in any particuler, I must be content to remeyne under some disquietnes of minde, untill I shall be enabled by knoweing particulers, to give your excellency full satisfaction. Since major Pitman went hence towards your excellency, beinge sent by his highnes, all that is come to my knowledge touching our affaires is this, that there was an intention in some of the officers to have sent forth a remonstrance, to have justified the late actions in the army; but upon a debate the other night, the thoughts of that were layd aside. What the true grounds of this resolution were, I knowe not; but possiblye I may come to understand them afterwards. It is certeyne they were once fully resolved to put forth a declaration.

In themeane tyme the severall partyes, whoe are enemies to the present government, goe on very vigorously. There was a meetinge the other day of several comonwealthsmen, to witt, Scott, Weaver, Nevill, Ludlowe, Cole, Blacke, Birch, &c. where resolutions were taken, how the buisness should be manadged in parliament. The first thinge they intend to move is, that all voets should be past by a ballatinge box, judgeinge that there will be many Nicodemittes in the house, who would be of their partye, if they durst. After this is past, they intend to dispute the parts of the petition and advice; as first, that the house of lords ought to be approved by the house of comons; that all the councill ought to be soe alsoe. 3dly, That the house ought to be satisfied of the succession, thinking by these steps to bringe in the comonwealth. What these men will be able to effect in the house, I knowe not; but certainly noe endeavours will be wantinge to put us into trouble. Wee have not yet heard any thinge further from the Sound. Our ships still lye winde-bound; and this season of the yeare gives a stop to all action every-where. I rest

Your EXCELLENCY'S

Humble and faithfull servant,

JO. THURLOE.

The day for the meetinge of the parliament is the 27th of January.

Mr.

Mr. R. Baker to secretary Thurloc.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

A.D. 1658.

MY lord, I am sensible of the trouble I have given you, more then of my owne wearied steps for these three yeares. The charge in suing such a tedious suite in France and here, and the absence from our affaires and families; and now that by your favour wee have arrived soe neare to a period, wee most humbly beseech your lordship to remember, that wee have proved by seven wittnesses, how that those, that tooke the ship Endeavour, confest, that they had noe commission; and itt is most certayne true, that they had none at all; yet I have lately understood, that they have a commission now produced (antedated). Their subtilties are beyond expresseion, and the least wound in your order (seeing itt is to be sent to them) may give them an occasion to cavell, and for an evelasting contest; and there will be no expectation for them to compound with us, which is what wee desire.

Wherefore wee most humbly beseech your lordship, that, if possible, there be nott mentioned the wound commission; and that the order be possitive, that our adversaries may be induced thereby to give us part, if not all our due, which wee hope they will doe, when you shall nott leave them a gapp open for their further dispute; for I humbly conceive, that the judges of the admiraltie used not the word commission, but as circumstance, or for augmentation.

Captain Sadlington, an Englishman, that tooke a French shipp by a commission from the parliament lounge before the peace, is now condemned in France by the same court of justice, where ours depended, to pay for the shipp, damages, costs, and interest, because he brought nott the French shipp directly into the ports of England, to have had the maryners examined, and the same ajudged in our court of admiraltie. Sir, they have just ajudged the Endeavour contrarie.

I humbly tender your lordship this request concerning our order, because thereby you may be freed from our further troubles, and I from the clamour of many poore, that have not to eate, and depend hereuppon. Sir, pardon the presumption of

Mr. Downing, resident in Holland, to secretary Thurloc.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

THE post which should have come last week from England is not yet arrived; so that I have nothing to say in answer to any of yours. I hope mine by the last post will come safe to your hands, wherein there was inclosed the answer of the states general 217 199 also news I had from collonel Sydney;

459 491 390 158 139 68 319 32 306 254 365 390 82 139 168 33 390 170;
your orders concerning him.

and I pray, that I may have 511 416 263 132 140 254 105 251 132 393 107 56 326. I have herein inclosed to you copies of the resolution taken by the states of Holland concerning the French embassador, and my memorial concerning the present war between the kings of Sweden and Denmark; and commonly the states general do follow what is first agreed upon by the states of Holland; so that you will be able probably thereby to guess, what answer we are like to have. The Hamburg post is not yet come this day; but by the last letters we have advice, that notwithstanding what had been done by the king of Denmark for the stopping of the harbour of Landschronen, that yet the king of Sweden's ships might come out; and here is a vessel arrived in this country, that says they met two English ships, which they supposed to be men of war, beyond Schage. Also here is one captain Banker, who was sent with a man of war to join with admiral Opdam, who is returned, and faith, that being come within sight of Cronenburg castle, he saw there about 19 or 20 sail of ships at anchor; and some of them weighing anchor to make after him, he durst go no further, but returned hither. Here is no great credit given to his report, though a captain of one of their men of war; nor do men know well what to think, whether these ships should be the Swedes ships out of Landschronen, or the English fleet. The weather is as cold as most men judge it was any time the last winter, with great snow, and extreme frost; so that it's not now doubted but that the Sound

A.D. 1658. Sound is freezing. The states are in great trouble about their fleet under Opdam, how they will get back, both in regard of the frost, and the English fleet; and it will be hard to provide them with victuals there, or to secure them against firing. Here is also much talk of the English fleet, how they will do this winter against firing, in case all those waters should be frozen, and that some accident should befall the king of Sweden's army. We expect by the next to hear what becomes of the king of Sweden's forces in the island of Alsen; and if the frost continue, as it's likely to do, it is judged by all men, that the king of Sweden will draw his army again into Holstein, to fight the elector of Brandenburg. At Amsterdam they say, that vice-admiral Goodson is gone for Scotland. I am,

Vol. lxii. p. 511. HERE has been again read the letter from the admiralty of Amsterdam, wherein they say, they are not able to furnish the fleet designed for the Sound, if they have not first in ready money 350,000 livres, or at least 100,000 for the present, with assurance, that the rest shall be received within 15 days after, without further trouble: whereupon, after deliberation, it hath been resolved, that letters shall be again written to the said admiralty, that they will not make any further difficulty to put in execution the resolution of the 11th instant, and the rather because the deputies of Zeland, Frise, and Groningen promise to oblige themselves, that the admiralties of Zeland and Frise shall put the order contained in the said resolution upon some merchants of Amsterdam; and that the money, which the said admiralty shall pay before-hand, shall be restored effectually; whereof they may be assured.

DEARE BROTHER,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburne.

I WAS much surpris'd the last saturday by major Pittman, who, just when he was ready to take post, was pleas'd to give me a vifit, and to acquaint me, that his buyfness to Ireland was to acquaint you with his highnes thoughts in referance to your presant return for England, and to satisfy you concerning the same. I told him, I was troubled at it, fearing you would not only be discouraged, but that also I should sufferr likewise; yet in this I was as much stranger to any such resolution as my child, not in the least having heard of any such purpose, till the major's coming to me; and therefore I do presume upon you, as not to let me suffer for what I was so much a stranger unto. I would be glad to have our mutuall confydence increase, and therefor am the more troubled at any thing, which may have the least colour to the contrary. Whearin at any time I sayle of my part, I shall be glad to understand it, befor ill thought of by you. I doe not much question, when the Lord brings us together, things will be better understood by us, which was a reason of my desires to see you hear, which I suppose will not be long, though the grownds grownds of the present suspension I am unacquainted with. We are now preparing for a parliament. Ther doth seeme to be good hopes thereof, which that it may be, I hope I shall not be wanting in my endeavors to promote, continue, and incourage so good and necessary a worke; which that we may finde the fruits of, is the desir of

Your most affectionate brother, and humble servant.

Dr. Thomas Clarges to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELENCY,

THE rigidnes of this season produces little newes, being a time unfitt for action. I heare from Flanders, that the archduke of Tiroll is expected to take the government of these provinces in the king of Spaine's power. He is of the house of Austria, and is mentioned to marry the king of Spaine's daughter. From Lyons they write, that the king of France intends speedily to leave that place, and return to Paris. The cardinall is disappointed in his designe to marry the king to the daughter of Savoy, whoe (if I am not misinform'd) he much mislikes, I meane the young lady. It is certainly concluded, that a parliament shall be call'd to meet the 27th of January; and I thinke there never was more need then now to choose honest and able men, which I am confident your excellency will take care to do in Ireland; and if amongst them five or six good argumentative speakers could be elected, they might be of good advantage to his highnes service; and withall if they would all come, and sitt, (for not half the number appeared the last parliament) with your excellencie's pardon, I think these following, if they be chosen, will be excelent persons, Mr. William Domville, now resident in Lincoln's-inn, Sir Anthony Morgan, Doctor Pettey, Mr. Vincent Gookin, and Mr. William Temple. Domville is by birth an Irishman, a grave solid man, but one that has a good estate neere London, and lives heere constantly; and Mr. Temple is the eldest son of the master of the rolls, whole parts are concealed by his modesty; but, to my knowledge, he is one of excelent reasoning, and will prove a good winneing speaker. I believe my lord president of Connaught, my lord Broghill, and my lord Reneloh, can all of them give you a character of Mr. Domville, who is one, that knowes not I write in his behalf, but is worthy of choice. If the younger son of Sir John Temple were also chosen, he might doe well; for his pleading has furnished him with confidence to speake, and I doubt not, but he would be very serviceable. I believe Mr. Byffe will be elected for Dublin, and he will skearcely come to sitt; so that it were better some other came in his place. I humbly ask your excellencie's pardon for the trouble I give you in this occasion, which is the effect of an earnest zeale I have to his highnes service; and therefore I hope you will the more easily pardon it in me, because I am,

19th December.

THE states general of the Provinces United of the Low-countries having seen and examined the memorial presented by the resident Downing, &c. the 30th past to their high mightinesses, touching the re-establishing of peace in the northern parts, and principally between the kings of Sweden and Denmark, have, after mature deliberation, found good to answer hereby to the said resident, that their high mightinesses have had extraordinary satisfaction in the declaration made in the name of the lord protector of England, &c. that his highness, as well as the king of France, are ready jointly to co-operate with their high mightinesses to arrive to the aim, that their high mightinesses, by their resolution of the 27th past, proposed to themselves, to wit, for obtaining peace in the northern parts. Their high mightinesses on their part, for the same end, and for forwarding of a joint mediation of the three states aforesaid, proposed in the said memorial, as the best means tending thereto, being inclined to send in like manner speedily to the said two kings extraordinary ministers, with order and instructions to make, jointly with the ministers of France and England, and to help to effect propositions for accommodation, and such endeavours, as by common consent, and according to the juncture of affairs, shall be judged the most expedient for the said end, praying in the mean time his highness, that he would by no means hearken to, much less believe, the reports, which have been, or

A.D. 1658. shall be, spread abroad, that their high mightinesses should resolve or intend to undertake or execute that, which could not but give occasion or facilitate the affairs, which their high mightinesses hold to be very prejudicial, as well to themselves, as to their allies.

Resolution touching a peace in the northern parts.

19th Decemb. 1658. [N.S.]

Vol. lxii.
P. 533.

THE deputies of Zeland, by express order of their superiors, have made instance, that whereas it hath been declared in the names of the king of France and the protector of England, that they are ready to establish a peace between the two kings of the north, and that it will be for the good of this state, and for the freedom of commerce, besides that it concerns particularly all Christian princes and republics; it will be expedient, that besides the ambassador Isbrants now residing in the court of the elector of Brandenburg, there be speedily sent one or two of those ambassadors, that have been lately in Sweden and Denmark, to those two kings, that they may resume the treaties for a good and equitable accommodation, and to require the ministers of France and England to join their endeavour for so good and wholesome a work, according to the said offer of their masters; but first that the intention of the said kings be known, if the mediation of the ambassadors of this state shall be accepted, that so the said offices and endeavours may not only not be in vain, but also that all may proceed to the honour of the state. Whereupon the said deputies of Zeland have also required the other provinces to declare themselves herein.

19th December, [N. S.]

THE deputies of Zeland have declared in the assembly, that their superiors having read the instructions and resolutions taken by their high mightinesses touching the war between the kings of Sweden and Denmark, whereunto the said deputies did not consent, but only at the pleasure of their superiors, and according to other provinces, they have now approved all, as tending to the good of the state, and to maintain the defensive league made with the said king of Denmark. Whereupon, after deliberation, their high mightinesses have returned thanks to the said deputies for the same.

* Anabaptists.

SINCE my last, which was about some 16 days past, I have only this to advise your lordship, to wit, that the A. B. * have some brittle dependency of some private design now carrying on in your parts in their favour; but the depth of this, or what they would be at, I can't as yet discern, it being only known to some of the chief or cabinet council; and as it prospers, will become more open. I only give you this, appearing but as a little cloud here, not knowing but that it may be here discerned by you, that see further, and more of this nature. As to the malignant party here, they seem now to have quit all hopes of gaining by any difference, that shall arise by settling the present —; but now they have many created hopes started up in room of the other; first, that the Hollander and we shall fall out, and that we shall be surely beaten, because the Hollanders have many new and better frigates, and more money provided, than they ever had before. Further, that we have no money to carry on a war with them, being, as they say, hardly ever able to pay our navy and army's arrears. The next is, that they will needs imagine differences, that will arise at the session of the next parliament; and give some reasons for it, which would be too large here to insert. Lastly, they boast, that the emperor and some others intend to do much for C. S. against the next year, and that there are factions broken out among us already, who meet, ay and will meet, (as they say) at St. James's. Mr. Nowell's creatures make most sad work here about the salt, resolving to make a mere monopoly of it. Be assured, Sir, that farmers of this nature will be the ruine of all trades but their owne. It was easy to collect the customs here and excise duly and truly, if a right course was taken, and great men forbear to thrust in their boys and children fit or unfit. * * * I am

TIMOTHY LANGLEY.

Mr.

Mr. S. Disbrowe, one of the council of Scotland, to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

A.D. 1658.

I RECEIVED yours of the 30th of November, which gave intimation of his highnes Vol. lxii. p. 517. and the councill's resolve to call a parliament. The consequences and effects of such an assembly I would hope and earnestly pray, may be for good: and surely it is every one's duty, who wishes well to the peace of our Syon, to be industrious in his station to promote an election of persons of honest and sober principles. In order therto, so farr as may relate to this nation, I would humbly offer and beg a resolve of two thinges; first, whether it may stand with his highnes good pleasure to have the members of his council here chosen; and if so, whether it will be judged convenient, that they may come up, or any of them, there being here but four, besides my lord general Moncke. 2dly. Whether you have in your thoughts any able and fit persons (two or three) who may do service in the house, whom you may desire to be chosen for Scotland, which I doe not doubt may bee effected, if you please to commend any such to the general, wherein I shall give my best assistance, there being som countyes and townes in this nation, who being not able to mayntayne such as they would elect, and so will chuse non at all, except some persons be recomended to them, who will put them to noe charge; and being confident, if I hinder it not myselfe, I shall be chosen for the place I formerly served for, I would humbly beg to know, whether it may be his highnes pleasure, I should attend it; wherein I have noe desire of my owne, being as free in myselfe to stay here, as to come thither, as his highnes shall command. I have not to add, but my hearty and humble thanks for the undeserved respects you have been pleased from time to time to put upon me; and am

YOUR LORDSHIP'S

Most affectionate, most faythfull, and humble servant,

SA. DISBROWE.

P R E S E N T,

Lord Disbrowe,
Mr. secretary,
Lord Jones,

Lord Fleetwood,
Lord Sydenham,
Lord Strickland.

By the committee of the council for the affairs of Mardike.

9th Decemb. 1658.

THE committee having taken consideration of a paper of proposalls tendered to them Vol. lxii. p. 497. for the better carrying on his highness in Flanders, and for furnishing his highness's garisons and forces there, do offer as their humble opinion to the council, that the severall orders and directions following be forthwith put in execution; viz.

1. That the commissioners of the admiralty and navy be authorized and required forthwith to appoint such vessel as they shall think fit, to transport to Dunkirk the beds and other provisions now provided to be sent for the use of his highness's forces there.

2. That Mr. Symball and Mr. Powell do take care, that the 600 beds, with ruggs, and other things, provided by Mr. Martin Noel, be forthwith put aboard such ship, as the commissioners of the admiralty and navy shall appoint for transporting provisions to Dunkirk.

That Mr. Richard Scutt, usher of the council, with all speed provide 100 doz. pound of candles of long tens to the pound, and cause them to be carefully packed up, and delivered to Mr. Powell and Mr. Symball, that they may care for putting them on board the vessel, that is also appointed to carry provisions to Dunkirk; and that the said Mr. Scutt bring a bill to this committee, to the intent order may be taken with Mr. Gualter Frost for satisfiying his disbursements therein.

4. That the lord Lockhart be desired to cause duplicates under the hand of the commissary of the musters of all the muster-rolls for the horse and foot in Flanders, to be from time to time sent over to the council here; and that, for the supply of the horses, which shall from time to time die in the service, upon certificate produced from the lord Lockhart, that the person, whose horse is dead, is continued in the service, and liberty be given him for transporting such other horse as he shall provide, custom-free.

5. That

A.D. 1658. 5. That his highness will please to give direction and power to the lord ambassador Lockhart, to cause the magistrates of the town of Dunkirk to be elected in the usual manner, care being taken, that his highness and the English interest be provided for, as may be consistent with the articles of surrender.

6. That it be left to the lord ambassador Lockhart, by such persons as he shall think fit, to transact for such proportions of hay, as shall from time to time be necessary for the supply of the regiment of horse at Dunkirk, the charge whereof to be defrayed by the moneys allowed on the establishment for the pay of the said regiment.

7. That the lord ambassador Lockhart be left at liberty to make such agreement with the inhabitants of Nieuport and Ostend, for liberty of fishing on that coast, as he shall judge reasonable, and agreeable to the present constitution of affairs.

8. That John Ashurst, of London, merchant, be required with all speed to perfect his account with Mr. Jessop, one of the clerks of the council, for such moneys as were remitted to him out of France by the direction of the lord ambassador Lockhart.

9. That Mr. Jessop do prepare a state of his account for the moneys by him received and paid for the service of Flanders.

A letter of intelligence.

Paris, 20th December, 1658. [N. S.]

Vol. lxii. p. 531. MADAME de Savoy went away from Lions the 8th, without much satisfaction, without making any great presents to the officers of the king, who entertained her. It is doubtful, if the king will keep Christmas at Lions or Nevers. The queen sent a present to the duchess of Savoy of 50 buttons of diamonds; and the marquis of Mortemar carried to her from the king for the duke a sword worth 50,000 crowns, and a chain of diamonds for the princess Margaret. It was observed, that the king, in leading the duchess, put not himself near the princess, as he had done at her first arrival. The promise given to the duchess is written with the king's own hand, and signed by him and the queen, although she shewed much aversion from this marriage. The writing is, that if within four months a marriage be not made with the infanta of Spain, she shall receive intire satisfaction. She would be assured, that this negotiation should be broken, and refused at first to take the writing. Monsieur de Lionne is not likely to go into Spain, till Bartet be returned, and the queen of Spain brought-to-bed. The English have taken, confiscated, and brought to Toulon, a Holland ship, called the Mary of Amsterdam, and was bound for the isles of St. Domingo.

Mr. Downing, the English resident in Holland, to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Vol. lxii. p. 539. YESTERDAY I received yours by a frigate from the Downs, together with his highness's letter to the states, and other papers, concerning the three ships taken coming out of Bantam; but having the last week sent you the answer of the states general to my last memorial concerning the said ships, I shall forbear doing any thing further in that business, until your further order. I hope, as to restitution, that resolution will do the turn; for in case that the inventory of goods, to which that hath relation, shall be short, I hope I shall be able to prevail to have that amended, so as that they may have full restitution; but for satisfaction of damages, there is indeed no mention of that, and that is a thing of great intricacy and difficulty to adjust and obtain. Truly I never had so hard a task in my life, as to obtain what I have obtained; and upon direction from yourself and the merchants, shall endeavour the putting it into a way of execution to their contentment.

We have very little news here at present. Your letters are commonly more fresh from Copenhagen than ours, the passage by land being so uncertain, by reason of the armies, which are in the way, and the passage by sea being not very free to this place. The captain of one of this state's ships mentioned in my last, which I sent you upon tuesday last by a merchant, which went from Skeveling for London, doth positively yet affirm, that he saw a fleet riding under Cronenburg-castle; which, if so, must be the king of Sweden's fleet come out of Landschronen, where it was here hoped, that admiral Opdam would have shut them up, by stopping up the harbour. Men do generally think here, that it's very well for his highness's fleet, in respect of their own safety, that they are got back again to England; for the harbours and rivers being all frozen here, nothing but ice can be expected in the Sound, and consequently nothing of action for the fleet, and hazard and danger enough, into what place soever they should have retired for their preservation.

servation. And withal its said, that in probability in the spring-time a fleet may be A.D. 1658. much sooner in the Sound from England than out of Gottenbourg, or any other harbour of the king of Sweden's, for that they continue frozen long after the Sound is open. The states are in great trouble for Opdam's fleet, both in relation for their surety this winter, and the providing them with victuals, for which, as you will perceive by the inclosed, all possible care is taking. Neither the French ambassador nor myself have yet any answer given us to our memorial. Here is great difficulty made, whether in case the states should agree to send their ambassador, that the king of Sweden would admit them in the quality of mediators, and so they rendred ridiculous; and this difficulty sticks mainly. And upon this account Mr. Appleboom hath been spoken unto, that he would give in a memorial, inviting them thereunto. But he answered, that being they had attack'd his master's fleet in a hostile manner, and given orders to their admiral to ruin them, where-ever he could find them, and to transport his enemies, he would do nothing without further orders. And the French ambassador and myself were also spoken to, to the same purpose, that we would each of us give in another memorial, to invite them to send their ambassadors. But I answered, that they might well consider, that they had already received two papers to that effect, the one given to their ambassadors at London, and the other by me to the states here; and all this out of mere kindness to them for their sakes; and therefore, it was now time to expect something from them; besides, they are afraid of Copenhagen, lest it should not be sufficiently provided to hold out this winter; and that there being engaged thus in the way of a mediation might tie up their hands as to further acting for the providing of that place. On the other hand, they are apprehensive, lest if they should neglect the overture, which hath been made to them, they should not have another of that kind; and the king of Sweden carrying Copenhagen by force, they ruined in their traffick unto that sea, which is indeed the foundation of their strength and riches. Besides, they are dayly pressed on all sides, upon the account of Poland and Brandenburg, as that by this way of procedure they will lose them, and yet not sure of the king of Sweden; and they do all say plainly, that though that king doth press England and France to take his part, yet not so as to be his counsellors, or that upon their account he will be willing to quit his hold in Zeeland, one port town upon that sea being of more importance to him than all Poland, or a great part of Germany from the sea-side. I asked Mr. Appleboom, what his thoughts were of our giving another memorial, as above-hinted; but found him very little inclining to it, saying, that this state had need of some to mediate for them. Here is much talk of having a very strong fleet at sea the beginning of the spring, and, for fear of what may happen to Opdam's fleet, of building thirty sail of new frigates.

Here is very much talk of a peace making between England and Spain, as also between France and Spain; and great hopes there are of great changes upon these accounts; and the sowing of jealousy is an excellent artifice. It was that broke the league between France and this country; and on the other hand its good to be sure as much as may be.

I have this last week obtained the restitution of a very good ship, which belonged in a great part to captain Lilburne of Durham, and was brought into Zeeland by an Ostender. I have also obtained the arresting of all the goods that belong to any of Flanders in Zeeland, until such time as they shall bring back an English ship, which they had brought prize into Zeeland, and, after the taking out part of her lading, set sail with her for Flanders; and these are the first ships, that I believe were ever restored upon this account in Zeeland to English or any other nation whatsoever: and I hope, by this means, to make those Flanders pyrates have very little mind to bring their prizes, for the future, into the harbours of this state. There are also some other ships, which I hope in a few days to have restored to their owners. In some of my former, I wrote to you about a ship called the Vrede or Peace, which sailing from Guinea in the year 1655, with design, as 'tis said, to pass by the isle Martinico, and so for Holland, without any thoughts or order to go to the Barbadoes, or any other place belonging to the English, was yet taken by general Pen, under pretext of being bound for Barbadoes. I could earnestly desire, that you would be pleased to take such order, as that the said ship with her lading might be delivered by the court of admiralty at London to its proprietors; for I have obtained restitution of divers ships, and should be heartily glad to let them see by that instance, you would be as ready to do as to demand justice; and the restitution of this ship will take away all the cry, that is made concerning the ships of this country taken by general Pen; for all the rest were taken (as I am credibly informed) actually trading at the English plantations. The post, which should have come last week, is come yesterday; but this weekes post is not yet come. To-night or to morrow I am promised the resolution of the states generall concerning the warr in the North, which I intend to send by the friggott. p. 537.

THE 16th instant I have received letters and writings from your high mightinesses of the ill usage, that some English ships have shewed to some Holland ships in the Mediterranean sea near Marseilles and Leghorn; whereof I intending to speak with the secretary, have sent unto him. This morning he hath sent by Mr. Morland, that I shall shortly have answer upon my memorials touching the 2 Portugal prizes; but that first the opinion of the admiralty was expected. I thank'd him, and answer'd, that I had a desire to speak with the secretary upon other affairs, that concerned the public good. I now am informed, that the 15 ships went away but the day before yesterday from Solsbay in Suffolk toward the Sound; and that Sir George Askew with 4 great frigats, and a Swedish man of war, and a merchant ship, followed after from Queenborough; but there have been since so little wind, and such mists, that they could not go much forward.

Vol. lxii. p. 531.

DON John passeth through France with 3 coaches, and the rest of his company goes by sea; but it is not yet known, who shall succeed in his place: yet it is said, that the archduke of Inspruck is already on his way hither, with the marquis de Fuentes, to receive the government; yet he hath more mind to the government of Milan. It will be the end of the next month before Don John goes hence. They speak still here of a peace with England; and the chief ministers say, that on the king of Spain's part, they underhand labour continually, to dispose all things for the same. It is said, that cardinal Mazarin desires, that the king of France should match with the infanta of Spain. Next week Don Stephen de Gamarra returns to the Hague, to reside as embassador. Within few days it will be concluded with the states of Brabant for the maintaining of 8000 men, and with the state of Flanders for 5000 men. Lately the prince of Condé hath received 200,000 crowns, and he is to have 15,000 more; and then goes into Germany, to pay the forces, that come from thence, 350,000 crowns.

Vol. lxii. p. 293.

THAT the 24th of November last the dukes of York and Gloucester went to the princess royal at Breda, and staid until the second instant, and then returned to Brussels.

That Mrs. Stephens, who came over out of England lately, brought very small comfort for the royal party; and Charles Stuart is much dejected, and is very poor, having pawned all his plate, and is served in nothing but pewter.

There came a packet of letters for him inclosed in a cover to Colt of Rotterdam, merchant, which the said Colt sent immediately to Charles Stuart by Williams, whom I have formerly mentioned. Colonel Hauskett and Lovelace, who were lately put in the Tower, of whom I gave you formerly an account, are able to inform you of any design, that is on foot, the said Lovelace for Oxfordshire, and Hauskett for Kent. Don John goes within this fortnight forwards towards Spain, and Caracena with him, as some say. Dr.

Dr. Benj. Whichcot to lord chief justice St. John.

MY LORD,

A.D. 1658.

I YESTERDAY received your lordship's letter (but none before; yet Dr. Tuckney had a letter from Whitehall, on munday, about the same busines, the contents wherof he did presently communicate); and I did immediately deliver the enclosed to our vice-chancellor. I shall take the best care of the busines I possibly can; so also, I am sure, will the rest of the heads upon the place. We resent the busines very well, and highly like the person your lordship doth propose; and I hope the body of the university will doe the same; for the uncertenty lies in this, that every master of arts hath as much to doe in this election as any doctor; yet I trust we shall all agree. Yet I must acquaint your lordship, that Sir Francis Russel hath sent, and on monday intendes to come in person, to move for Sir Anthony Morgan of Ireland, in the name of the lord lieutenant of Ireland. Yet I greatly hope, and doe beleive, that the university doth see highly honour the person, and so greatly regard (as becomes us) your lordship's recommendation, that whosoever proves second, Mr. secretary will be the first in our election; and herof as in motion, if there be cause, see in the determination therof I shall timely certify your lordship. So with my most humble service presented I take leave,

Cambridge, Dec. 11. 1658.

Your LORDSHIP's humbly devoted servant,

BENJ. WHICHCOT.

Dr. Thomas Clarges to Henry Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELENCY,

THERE is a commission issued for the tryall of captain Whetston and captain Saunders at a court marshall of the admiralty. There will be all the commissioners of the admiralty in it, and many others officers and gentlemen, and the quorum are not to be less then fourteen. I have not heard intimation of their crimes, but the first of them was lately sent prisoner from captain Stoakes, commander of the fleet in the Mediterranean sea. My lord Fleetwood and my lord Desbrowe are made lords wardens of the Cinque ports, and constables of Dover; and this day my lord Whitlock will be made one of the lords commissioners of the great seale. I had advice yesterday from Dunkirk, that my lord Lockart is march'd out with a small party of horse and foot, to attempt something upon the enemy, of which I shall hope to be able to write more particularly to your excellency by the next. To-morrow the election will be for the citty of London, where so many are in nomination, that I am not able to guesse at those will carry it. I have in my letter to the lords of the councill given their lordships the names of as many as I know of the persons elected to serve in parliament, amongst whome doctor Petty is one, chosen for West-Loo in Cornwall; and it will be very necessary for his highness service, that your excellency give him leave to be heere at the first sitting of the parliament.

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shel-burn.

I was informed, it was lately moved at a common councill in the citty of London, that the citty should invite his highnes, and the councill, and the officers of the army, to a feast, which after some debate was disapproved, first by alderman Touke, whoe told them, in the year 1640, or 41, the citty invited the late king and his councill to a feast, which was look'd upon with much jealousy by the then lately begunne parliament, as if they thereby intended to countenance and support the court against them; and the imprisonment of the lord maior and many other changes followed as the effect of that entertainment, and the jealousy contracted by it; so that to prevent the like at this time, he thought it advizable to stay till the parliament assembled, and invite them al together: and so it was resolved.
 This narrative was told me so privately, that I humbly intreate your excellency to commu-cate it to few, because I was desired to conceale it by the person, that told it to,

May it please your EXCELENCY,

London, this 11th of Dec. 1658.Your excellencie's most humble and most obleiged servant,

Consul Maynard to secretary Thurloe.

A.D. 1658.

Vol. lxii. p. 557.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

I WRITE your honour ten days past by several conveyances, and since that time I find no alteration in the Portugal affairs. The Spaniards continue their siege both at Elvez and Mouson, and the Portugeze are raising forces as fast as they can (which God knows is slow enough) to fight them; but 'tis much to be doubted, unless there be some diversion made by some prince with the king of Portugal, it will be difficult to get the Spanish armies out of this kingdom; and if they continue here till the spring, and beat the Portugeze in the field, this country will be in very great hazard of losing.

I received yesterday a letter from Cadiz dated the $\frac{18}{28}$ November, in which I am written, that certainly the galleons are expected there about the end of December; but the fleet being great and heavy sailors, they may stay 20 or 30 days longer. The Spanish fleet comes wonderful rich; they bring in all about 60 millions; and though they are in all about 64 ships, which will be laden and much pestered, less than half that number of men of war will (by God's assistance) deal with them well enough. The duke of Medina Cely hath freighted five Holland ships at Cadiz, from 24 to 28 guns a-piece, and taken up five small Spanish ships: all ten are to go out for advices, some to lye beyond the Canarie islands, and the rest betwixt the islands and the bay of Cadiz, to give advice to the plate fleet; and in case of danger, the Hollanders are to take out the treasure of the galleons, and carry it for several parts of Biscay and Galicia, and happily some of them may adventure through the channell. The duke hath four Dunkirkers, which he keeps in a readiness at Cadiz, to send out on all occasions. The Spaniard extremely fears the coming of the English fleet on their coasts, and the more because the duke of Medina hath advice from Amsterdam, that about the beginning of November last 40 sail of English frigats departed from the Downs and the isle of Wight, to wait the coming home of the West-India fleet. The Fairfax frigate appearing lately before Malaga, where were four Mayorkin men of war, which the governor of Malaga forced to go out and fight her; but having felt 2 or 3 of the Fairfax's broadsides, they fled all four, two of them to the Eastward, and two of them to the Westward: the Fairfax followed those two, that went up the Streights, and 'tis supposed she hath taken them both. I am sorry I have no conveyance to write to the frigats in the Streights of the Hollanders, which are set out by the duke of Medina, neither have I any conveyance to signify this to your honour; but my letters might go to several out-ports, to wait opportunities to be conveyed to you, whom I beseech the Lord ever to bless and prosper; and these shall always be the hearty prayers of

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Vol. lxii. p. 543.

UPON friday last, by the post I gave you an account of my having received your exprefs from the Downs; and I therein inclosed to you a copy of the states generals resolution given me in answer to my memorial concerning the present warr between the kings of Sweden and Denmark. I have kept the captain of the frigate until now, desiring, before I dispatch him hence, to speak with Monsieur de Witt, which I could not do until last night, by reason of his so much business, in regard of the assembly of the states of Holland, which separated late upon fryday last, and are to meet again the 15th of January. I did acquaint him with what new instructions I had received concerning the English ships taken in the East-Indies. He told me, that I knew very well, what a difficult thing it was to obtain any thing in this country, which might have a reflection upon their East-India company; and that he had laboured in that business, even to his utmost, upon my instigation, not only as a minister of state, but even among his particular friends; and therefore, that he hoped, that what he had done would be very acceptable to his highness; and that that business would be pressed no further. As to the scruple, which is made concerning the inventory, by which restitution is to be made, he hath promised me, that in case it be not full and true, that he will take care notwithstanding, for a full and true restitution of all which hath been taken, that so the merchants need not upon that account to concern themselves. But for the other points concerning reparation, and of losses, and of the honour of the nation, he desires, that seeing restitution is made, I would not further press them, as things now stand; and considering that his friends would say, that he had deceived them, them, in perswading them, that in case a full restitution were made, he did not doubt but A.D. 1658. that that would satisfy; whereas they would have had remonstrated to his highness such sufferings as have been from the English by the subjects of this state, and reparation and satisfaction to have been made alike at one time on both sides. He said, moreover, that the directors of the East-India company do allege for themselves, that in the year 1619 the English and Holland East-India companies did jointly agree, to send three Holland ships, and two English ships, to ride before Bantam, with order to stop and hinder from trading there all ships of any nation whatsoever; and accordingly they did hinder from trading there some Danes ships; and the order carried in it this reason, to wit, that this was the only way to reduce that barbarous people to reason. He also acquainted me, that for the better regulating affairs for the future, the East-India company here had now lately sent into the East-Indies one of the counsellors of the court of Holland, pensionary of the Brill, a very knowing (as he said) and well deserving person, who being to be judge there, will take better care for the observation of the treaty between England and this state. We had also much discourse about the place and way of making the restitution, whether it were better to do it here or in the East-Indies; but being that they had not yet received the advice of the directors of the East-India company, to whom they had written about it, nor that I knew the mind of the merchants, we could come to no conclusion therein; but when I shall know their mind, I shall do my utmost for them; and am,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Your most faithful humble servant,

G. DOWNING.

Dr. Thomas Goodwin to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONORABLE,

I SEND this by an express, Dr. Harrys of Trinity-college Oxon beeing now dead. Vol. lxii. p. 563. It is a sequestration, the old president beeing alive, and so belongs unto my lord; and this is to bee the first experiment of places falling under that distinction from others, where the former heads sequestred are dead, in which case you have permitted the fellows to choose, not in this. I made it long since a great request for my good old lord for some headship in the university for Mr. Thomas Cracroft, master of arts of eleaven yeares, which in the whole in the university, according to the ordinary account, is 18 yeares standing. I have given yourselfe and my lord, and this lord that now is, his character of his beeing a scholar, and a spirituall usefull man, as any other amongst us. Besides, hee hath been proctor, (and a laudable carriage therein is esteemed a great stepp to an headship, or other preferment) also a tutour successively unto three noblemen, and vice-president two yeares together in our college. Your honour may remember, that you were pleased to expresse as to mediate on his behalfe. I also spake twice to my lord about it, and twice named him personally unto his highnes, as I had often done, and sometyes in your hearing to my good lord that is gone. His highnes, that now is, was pleased to promise mee twice for him.

My earnest request is, that the most speedye and effectuall course may be taken, to prevent the college from a choyce, (which it is certeyn they will attempt, and then dispute it) by my lord's putting in this man by the broad seale (that course you were pleased to pitch upon, when I spake last about it). The gentleman himselfe is not so much confirmate in health as to waite upon my lord in it, especially so as publickly to appeare; but Mr. Panton of All-souls, a godly man, agitates for him. Sir, I wrote by Mr. Nye the state of my spirit and affayres unto you; and doe leave both that and this busines, and all my concernments, that are afore you, perfectly in your hands; and so rest,

Dec. 12th, 1658.

Your most obliged friend and servant,

THO. GOODWIN.

Secretary Thurloe to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

A.D. 1658.

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburn.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

SINCE my last I have received none from you, the post beinge not yet come from Ireland. Wee do little here but prepare for the next parliament, and our preparations have only consisted in matters of forme hitherto, though I beleve things more substantiall are as necessary to be thought of before the meetinge of that assemblie; it beinge like to be a great crisis, and noe endeavours are omitted to give trouble; and wheither men, who designe it, will not be able to effect their intentions in it, I am not able to say. That which all here seeme to be fixt in, is to adhere to the Petition and Advise; and if the foundation thereof be admitted, viz. a single person and two houses of parliament, I hope wee may agree in all other things, which truly I thinke is all mens duty to endeavour as far as falls in his power; for I very much dread the consequences of a breach, which if it should fall out, I see not how it will be possible to keep out the common enemye longe, who thinkes he hath already layed his buisines soe, that it cannot miscarry. And its most certeyne, that C. Stewart and his brother James have designed to be here at the first meetinge of the parliament, takeing it for graunted, that troubles will come in with the parliament; and I believe they have done their parts to make them. Besides these inbred troubles, wee are not upon very good termes with the Dutch, who certainly intend very ill to us, if they can carry their designs in the Sound, upon which they intend to put their rest. And we beleve, that this state is also very much concerned in those affaires; and accordingly did send 20 ships to the Sound, which hath much alarmed the Dutch, who had resolved to send away 4000 foot, and some other ships of warre; but upon notice, that the English fleet was gone that way, they recal'd their men, though they were on ship-board, and ready to set sayle. The states generall alsoe agreed to the motion of his highnes to endeavour a peace betweene the 2 Northerne kings, which before they had denied to doe, which are very considerable effects of his highnes sendinge the fleet that way. Besides, hereupon, the kings of Denmark and Poland and elector of Brandenburg are sendinge ambassadors to his highnes upon this occasion. God is pleased yet to give us honour in the eyes of the nations. I wish wee doe not lay ourselves lowe, and stayne our owne glory. I remayne

General Fleetwood to Henry Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

DEARE BROTHER,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburn.

I AM very unwilling to be troublesom to you; but the sadde condicion of my poore kinsman, the lord Lambert, maks me presume upon your favour to him, that you would please to consider his case, and remember the merrits of his father, and his own sufferings thes times, with the sadde condicion his poore family is in, who, it seemes, is lik to suffer very much through the pretence of a discovery, which is made of part of his estate as concealed; which though he did not make a formall discovery of, yet, as by the inclosed the thing was owned. And if after all his sufferings he must loose a part of his estate, will seeme to be very hard, which as I understand is lik to be his case, unlesse by your favourable interposition he may finde releife. If you will please to consider the equity of his case, it will oblige a poore family, and a great expression of your kindnes to mysele. The writts for the parliament will be sent you to-morrow by an expresse. Ther are great labourings to get in. We have our hopes and our feares. It is a time, which calls for great waiting upon the Lord. Accordingly his highnes and counsell have apoynted a day for the 3 nations to seake the Lord in, as also a privat day for his highnes counsell and army the next weeke. If the Lord is pleased to unite us in love, and remove jealousyes, even from amongst thos, who have most reason to love one another, it will be a choyce mercy, and a great argument, that the Lord hath yet a delight to doe us good, which I desire we may have hearts to desire and endeavour. We have hoped, that our late sending the fleet hath wrought a good effect amongst the Hollanders, which you will heare from other hands. I am

Decemb. 14. [1658.]

Your most affectionat brother, and humble servant.

Dr.

Dr. Thomas Clarges, to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELENCY,

A.D. 1658.

THE French forces are very active in Flanders to keepe the footing they have there. Marshall Thureine himself quarters in Ipre. Monsieur de Rochpere, a very gallant commander, is governor of Oudenarde; and because that place is much looked upon by the Spaniards, he is very diligent in finishing the fortification, and has got into it at least 4000 foot and 300 horse. From the court at Lyons they write, the duke of Savoy is gone from thence to Turin by post. His mother and the princes Margarite his sister are shortly to follow. It is sayd a match is concluded betwixt the king and the young princeffe of Savoy, upon condition not to be consummated till a returne of the archbishop of Lyons from Madrid, whoe is to treat of a match betwixt the king and the infanta of Spaine. And if it be not finished in four months, the other is to be celebrated. It is a suddaine resolution, and much discoursed of, that in the midst of all the preparations of warr betwixt those two crownes, a match of this nature should be propounded, especially at this time, when the house of Austria is so low in Flanders, and not in much reputation in other places. From Holland they write, that the French ambassidor and our resident have presented some memorialls to the states generall, in order to a reconciliation betwixt the crownes of Sweden and Denmark; but it is not said, what effects they had; but it is certaine, that the four thousand men intended are not gone to the relief of the king of Denmark. They had all new coates, before they were put on ship-board, but are yet staid. The Swedes have thirty ships in a place called Landscreon, which is blocked up by the Holland fleet; and admirall Opdam hath sent for eighteen more, to make up the want of those ships, that were lost or render'd unserviceable in the last fight.

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburne.

The king of Sweden hath summoned his men to Elfsineur, intending to send forces to strengthen Fredricksode, which the elector of Brandenburg with the confederate forces is preparing (notwithstanding the coldnes of the season) to besiege, having to that purpose assembled a good part of his forces together. But prince Adolphus, the king of Sweden's brother, will attempt to hinder him. The duke of Holstein, the king of Sweden's father-in-law, has been forced to agree to a very inconvenient neutrallity. He is to put into the duke of Brandenburg's hands the fortress of Gortop, and to receive into the garrison of Tonninguen as many of his soldiers as there are of his own in it; so that it is hereafter to be kept in common to both parties. And to make disadvantages the more considerable, he is not to have any alliances with the Swedes, or joine in any confederacy against the emperour, or king of Denmark. I suppose by the favorableness of the winds, our fleet may be by this time in the Sound, which may make some alterations in the affaires there.

My noble freind, my lord Broghill, about three weekes since, knoweing I had two distinct commissions from Scotland, one to be agent for the army from generall Monck, and another as agent for the counsell by order of the generall and the counsell, was pleas'd to acquaint me, that in regard I was only agent to the councill of Ireland, for which I have a hundred pounds a yeare, your excellency thought it fitt to give me an order to be agent for the army in Ireland, with a salary of a hundred pounds a yeare for that, over and above the salary I have as agent for the councill. In order whereunto, I sent to your excellencie's secretary doctor Gorges for your excellency's order to that purpose, who returnd me answere, that your excellency made some difficulty in it, by which I perceive my lord Broghill was mistaken; and I humbly desire your excellencie's pardon for the importunity some of my friends may have given your excellency upon this mistake; for I am so sensible of the obligations and respect I owe your excellency, that I think your acceptance of my duty and services is a sufficient reward for them; and I wish it lay so in power to doe your excellency service, as I am sensible there is a tye upon me to doe it; for I am,

THO. CLARGES.

Dr.

Dr. Thomas Clarges to the lord lieutenant and council of Ireland.

A.D. 1658. May it please your LORDSHIPS,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburn.

I BELEIVE by that time this comes to your lordships, the writs for the parliament will be with you allso; for I heare they are to be sent away to-morrow by an expresse. I am inform'd, the same members will be summon'd to the other house as in the last parliament. Some letters from France import, that there is a treaty on foot for a marriage with the infanta of Spaine, notwithstanding the vigorous prosecution of the warr on both sides: but there is a little restriction in it; that is to say, if it be not concluded in four months, the king is to marry the daughter of Savoy, and the conditionall articles are concluded.

Whilst the king of Sweden is endeavouring the safety of Fredericksode, which is suspected to be the designe of the enemy upon him, eight of the Holland ships, with some Danish men of war, are gone towards the Belt, to transport forces into Zealeand. But I hopee by this time our fleet will be in those parts to moderate these affaires. The city of Thoren hath bin gallantly defended by the Swedish garrison; and at the last assault made on the 18th of November they kil'd many of the king of Poland's eminent commanders, as Clebeck and Poswisky, and some others; but being oppressed by fresh numbers, they in the towne lost most of their outworks and the great bastion, which serv'd them instead of a citadell, so that it is conceived the place must be suddainly surrender'd.

The admirall Opdam hath sent hastily for 18 ships to supply his fleet: he himself is sick of the gout in Copenhagen; and it is thought Ruiter will goe with the next supply, to manage all when he comes thither, except Opdam be recovered.

The Muscovites have made an incursion into Poland, and routed a body that opposed them, and taken prisoner the generall Gonzieusky, whome they have carried to Minsco; but before they went, they left 3000 men in Vilna, a place, which they had surprized. But in the meane time, the Polanders had prevailed with the Tartars to make a diversion in Muscovie, which obliged them to retire to the safety of their own borders. I am,

May it please your LORDSHIPS,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Vol. lxi. p. 573.

I THOUGHT when I had the happines to attend you att London, and then contracted with your honour for the management as your deputy for the post-master's place in this nation, that I should not now lye in prison for want of that meanes payed me as my salarye. I beseech your honour to consider my condition, and the service I have performed; and if you be not satisfied by former certificates and recommendations for my fidelity, honesty, and diligence in the prosecution of your honour's affairs here, &c. you shall receive further. In the interim, I humbly desire your honour to take these following desires into consideration, viz. 1. That all charges ought to be certaine to time and person; and if any person be wronged in point of wages, the servant hath this liberty at law against his imployer.

2dly, That any person charginge another touching life, or livelyhood, ought to be bound by recognizance, to prosecute at common law; otherwise the charge is voyde in law.

3dly, And if any person shall disturbe any man's office of freehould, without lawful authoritie, it is mente mala, and punishable by law.

May it please your honour, the charge against me and my sallarie detained, I know is contrarie to your honour's disposition and will; and the person, that charges me, doth touch my life, credits and livelyhood, which is contrarie to the commission granted me by your honour, and those that doth disturb in my employment doth act contrary to your power, &c. All things being considered by your honour, I humbly begge, that you will please to send over order, that I may receive my sallarie, and to grant me licence to attend your honour; and if the 250 l. now claimed from me be due to your honour, I will put in sufficient security for the payment thereof. I hope your honour hath received letters from the councill and the lord Broghill, in my behalf, which I humbly desire may be taken into consideration, and to be honourably pleased to send an answer; and altho'

your honour cannot as yet be thoroughly satisfied with my realty, be assured, that you shall A.D. 1658. have good assurance of both my fidelity and integrity in all points whatsoever from honourable persons in this nation, and likewise of England; all which is left to your honour's pious and charitable thoughts, humbly craving your answer; and remain,

Sir Francis Russell to Secretary Thurloe.

DEARE SIR,

AS I was desirous to serve you, so have I bin buisy about it; and the other day sent Vol. lxii. to some of my neighbours, to meet me at Newmarket, to confer with them about P. 578. making choyse of yourselfe for one of our knights for this shire. I found them all ready and willing to give you their votes; and they were sensible, how much it would be to their advantage to have you a freind and servant to Cambridgeshire. Those of my neighbours, who were at some distance from me, I writ unto, as collonel Castle, my brother Chicheley, and some others, whose answers I have not as yet received. But that person, whom I did employ to the towne of Cambridge to speake to my freinds there, brought me word, that the university was unanimously resolved to make choyse of you for their burgesse. This they give out already, and send me word of what they resolve. Old Mr. Faireclough was with me, when that message was brought me, and was ready to put pen to paper to wright to his freinds of the cleargy about you, and to serve you as myselfe intended. Upon further debate with him, what was fit to be done, we concluded, that to know your mind now, whether we should proceed any further, was best; and that according to your advise and directions, we will goe on or desist. Therefore I desire to heare from you by the saturday post. Sir Anthony Morgan was very likely to have bin your brother burgesse; but I understanding by my lord Claypoole, that there will a certain number, choosen out of Ireland, to serve for that nation. I sent the vice-chancellor thanks for his respects towards my lord Henry and Sir Anthony. Sir, I hope to heare from you the first opportunity. My love for you is true and reall, and from a person (I think I may say) you know not, notwithstanding all our outward converse. This mistery, when 'tis known by you, I hope will not be to your disadvantage. You may be more than confident, that I am,

DEARE SIR,

Yours, to love and serve you faithfully,

FRANC. RUSSEL.

I should be glad to know, whether my lord Henry be likely to see England this winter.

Secretary Thurloe to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

I WRITT last night by the post, and therefore have nothinge more to trouble your In the posses- excellency with, save to present my humble services upon occasion of sendinge this sion of the right hon. messenger with the summons of parliament. I feare the tyme is somewhat short, unlesse the earl of your excellency be pleased to quicken the officers, who are concerned in this service, and to Shelburn. lay your comands upon the members chosen to hasten over, that they may be here the first day of the sittinge of the parliament; for otherwise they will be of no use at all to our affaires, which probablie may come to an issue, within a few dayes after the parliament fitts. And it is very necessary, that such be chosen, who will certainly come; for to choose such as cannot come by reason of their trusts, or will not, because of their other occasions, will be wholly fruitlesse to us. But I referre these thinges to your consideration and direction, beseeching your pardon for this boldnes in

Vol. lxii. p. 582.

SIR, by this conveyance, the bassa and divan having wrote his highness (concerning the Angell's businesse) which goes here inclosed, together with the translate, to which your honour may please to be referred. These people are very earnest to have justice done them, but care for doing none themselves; witnesse their unjust detention of severall Englishmen passengers uppon foreign shippes to the number of six in all, and six more, whoe escaped drowneinge out of an English shippe cast away upon the island of Corsica, bound from Tunis to Leghorne; foe the country people refuseinge to give them pratique, they were forced to make quarenteen under a tent they made on the sea-side, from whence they were taken (together with their guards) by a sattee of this place, and brought hither. I went and demanded them, but was able to procure noe other answer but this, that we had sold severall Turkes to the Venetians; and till they were brought againe, I might save this trouble. I told them it was my duty to demand them; and if they pleased to release them, well; if not, must acquaint his highness with their answer. They said, I did very well, and had their answer.

It's some monthes, that I have perceived their treatment of us has beene farre different from what it was wont to be; and now, since my confinement, an Englishman is not able to passe the streetes without beinge affronted, nor our servants goe about our necessary affairs without beinge abused; and they sticke not to tell us to our faces, that Englishmen are not as they were; and this not from the meanest sorte neither.

Your speedy answer to their letters, together with your orders how to proceed for the future, will be very requisite, least they give order for to search our shippes, e'er they have any notice of what has passed, and soe betray them under the notion of peace.

Thus haveinge given your honour an account of our condition as succinctly as I could, continew to subscribe my selfe

Your LORDSHIP's most humble servant,

ROB. BROWNE.

Inclosed in the preceding.

TO the strong and great Christian prince of England. After many recommendations you may please to take notice, that formerly divers of your commanders, captains, and counsellors have, from time to time, made peace with us; and we have agreed with them upon their words and religion, and what past betwixt us is confirmed; and upon our religion we will observe it and more; for here we have been very courteous to your ships, and when 5, 10, or 20 of them have come into our harbours from sea, we have given them provision, protection, and whatsoever they had occasion of. And divers times our ships at sea, meeting with yours, find in them Frenchmen, Spaniards, Genoeses, Portugueses, with their goods and estates, bound for their severall ports, as France, Spain, Genoa, Portugal, &c. which are our enemies; and more than this, we find Spaniards, Italians, Flemings, and other of our enemies ships at sea, carrying in them 2 or 3 English, purposely that if meeting with us, those English shall shew English colours, say their ship and goods are of England, and so deceive us. As also divers times your own ships betray us, which carrying our people or merchants to the Levant, Venetians, Genoeses, or Leghorneses, and deliver us into their hands, to be made slaves of. Upon this, time after time, we have demanded your consul of this place the reason of these things, who answers us sometimes, he knows nothing of it; other times he will write, and inform you of it: but henceforward we will require them at his hands; for we know no reason, why the English should do these actions; and so he hath made us stay, in hopes that these were only false reports. But in your year 1668, in the first spring, the great Turk, commander of those seas, sent to Smyrna his chiaus, and divers great men, in the time of his fleet going to sea, who arriving at Smyrna found four sail of ships. The chiaus of our beloved king and divers merchants met with the captains, and asked them whither they were bound, who answered, they were going towards England. So our people were very glad, and agreed for freight of themselves and goods; and they went to sea 4 ships in company bound for your westward. They had no sooner past the Arches but they met with four sail Venetians, and saluted one another with their guns; and hoisting out their boats, went aboard one another; and afterwards they gave the chiaus and our merchants 150 incirca into the Venetians boats; and we are certain they are made slaves of. But their states and goods remained still in the English ships, who afterwards divided the prey with them; which cheats and knavery we know you did not approve of; so that after these letters shall shall arrive to your hands, please to let the captain, that did this treachery, be brought A.D. 1658. to justice, and to let the relief be sent to our Musselmen and Great Turk's chiauses, wheresoever they be; and if you be not speedy in it, we are afraid of our king's anger; and according to the ancient custom, we will search what ships of yours we find at sea, and we will accordingly take out whatsoever of our enemies goods or persons we find in them; so that whatsoever Spaniards, Leghornes, or any of their goods at first we light upon, we shall make prize of; and then do not blame us, because we cannot abandon our beloved king's chiaus, and our brethren the Musselmen, and so please to take notice. We cannot believe our peace should be understood a good peace with so much treachery and falshood; nor can we imagine, that you their great king should approve of it: wherefore be pleased to be speedy in the remedy hereof; and God prosper you.

Consul Maynard to secretary Thurloe.

SIR,

THIS is a duplicate: the first wente by way of Oporto. Wee are now at the $\frac{16}{26}$. Decem- Vol. lxii. p. 560. ber; but noe alteration in these parts since the abovesaid. On the $\frac{15}{25}$. this instant, was the general affize of the inquisition: there came out aboute a hundred prisoners, in all about ninety of them accused for Judaism, eight for sodomy, and one for heresie, which was eatinge flesh on a fryday, with some Inglish and Dutch seamen. Of the 90 accused for Judaism thirty-fower came out with yellow coates, having confes'd themselves guilty; twenty-seaven came forth with coates painted with flames of fyer, who likewise acknowledged themselves guilty, but it was but little before they came out; and for their obstinatenesse came (as is usual) with that distinction: Six came oute with flaminge coates, with thire owne pictures hanginge on their brests, five men, one woman: for these there was noe mercy, but were burnt the day they came out of prison, for denyinge themselves to be guilty of Judaisme, notwithstanding it was proved by several witnesses, they were culpable of these followinge crymes: firste, They denied to eate swyns flesh, rabbett, and fish with scales. 2d, They had kept the feast of the Passover and other Jewish feasts: next, they had kept holey the Jewish sabath, and fasted several days in the yeare, untill the starrs appeared at night; and laste of all, which methoughte was soe ridiculous to be published, they were accused for boylinge onions in oyle, and washing their sallads in vinegar. When they were at the place of execution, they all professed they died Christians, and hoped to be saved by the merrits of Jesus Christ, sayeing they did rejoyce the hower was come, in which they should be for ever freed from the tortures and torments of the inquisition. They were all of them people of greate estates, which is supposed was their greatest cryme, for which they dyed.

Mr. John Durie to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONORABLE,

IN obedience to your command concerning the baptizing of the Turkish chious; I Vol. lxii. p. 620. humbly offer to your consideration, that it may be performed after this manner:

That seeing the providence of God hath directed him to be owned as a Christian by us, and that he is not only endued with competent knowledge, but conscientiously moved and zealously inclined to walke answerable to the holy profession, and hath given hitherto very evident manifestations of his sinceritie in his walking, to all that converse with him, and more particularly unto myself; I humbly conceive, that it will be very suitable unto his highness eminent piety and Christian charity, and a thing very commendable amongst all, that shall heare of it, if his highness would be pleased to countenance and owne him, in the act of his reception into the visible societie of Christians, and to that effect to give him his name Richard, to appoint him some persons of honour, who can speake French, to be present at his baptizing, who may, as witnesses of the act, make a report therof unto his highness, and then to admit the chious into his presence, that he may expresse his thankfulness unto his highness for the favour received, not only in the confirmation of his pension, which he got from his late highness of blessed memorie, but in the countenancing at his baptism, which I do believe he will esteeme as great, if not a greater favour, than his outward maintenance.

As for the manner of performing the act, he is very desirous, that it may be as public as with ordinarie convenience it may be; for his desire is, that it may appeare to all, that he rejoyces and glories in the profession of the name of Christ as his Saviour; and that he is not ashamed to renounce publickly the name of Mahomet; and that having beene a person of

A.D. 1658. of public qualitie heretofore in his owne countrie, the thing may be knowne to his countrie-men, which to me is a testimonie of the uprightnes of his former life and conversation amongst them; for, if he had beene under any guilt or crime in his countrie, he would not be so free as he seemes to be, to have the change of his religion made knowne unto them.

If his highness is pleased to command me to performe the act, as being fully acquainted with him, and fully perswaded of his capacitie and uprightnes in the knowledge and practice of Christianitie; I shall be ready to doe it in some public place at a time of church meeting. The place where it may bee done, if none other be found more fit, may bee the Covent-Garden, and on a Lord's day, either in the morning or in the afternoone, when a sermon of the nature and use of Christian baptism hath been preached.

Before the water be poured upon his head, or his head dipped in the water, (which may bee done in a great vessel) he should make a confession of his faith, and answer to such questions as shall bee proposed unto him concerning the motives, which have induced him to joyne himself to Christ, to renounce the Mahumetan religion, and concerning theretofore, which he hath taken to walke conscionably in the way of Christianitie; and upon his answer to these questions, he should be baptized in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, by vertue of Christ's commandement; and therewith it should be declared unto him, that he is now thereby sealed up to belong to Jesus Christ in the covenant of grace, and received as a visible member of his mystical bodie, in the Catholick church, and communion of saints, to become partaker of all the privilegdes of the household of the faith. This being done, the congregation should be exhorted to embrace him in their hearts as a fellow membr of the bodie of Christ; and to joyne in prayer to God for him, to inable him to walke worthy of the heavenly calling.

And the meeting being dissolved, such as shall appeare as witnesses to make a report unto his highness, should give him their hands, and welcome him into the societie of Christians; and then the rest of his acquaintance, who should be invited also to be present, should doe the like, that he may be encouraged in the way, wherein God hath sette him, by that outward testimonie of their love and fellowship in Christianitie with him.

And this I humbly conceive should bee done with all convenient speed; because Satan is very busie to divert him from seeking to bee baptized (whom, neverthelesse, he doth resist very stoutly) partly by terrours and threatenings, partly by persuasions and promises; appearing very oft in the visible shape of a man to him, sometimes in the habit of a Jesuit, sometimes in other appearances of persons, with whom he is acquainted; which at first was a heavie tryal unto him, but now of late is not so terrible; for God hath given him strength not to be afraid at his appearance any more.

This I humbly submit unto consideration; and, taking my leave, rest,

James-house, this 16th of December, 1658.

Your Honour's most humble servant in Christ,

JOHN DURIE.

The

The 22^d instant I wrote to you by captain Lilburne commander of the frigate, that A.D. 1658.
brought me the last express from you; and I have very little to add thereunto, save only, that upon tuesday last, conforming to what I had written to you, the French ambassador and myself had a conference with the deputies of the states general, wherein they declared to us, that although the states had resolved to send their extraordinary ministers to the king of Sweden, yet considering the present posture of affairs between that king and them, and what had befallen the ministers of the elector of Brandenburg, that they did judge it necessary to have some assurance of their ministers being received before their departure hence. To which we answered, that if what we had already declared in our memorials were not judged sufficient, we could add nothing thereunto, but that we would write to our masters, to let them know what they were pleased to say to us, and to return them their answer. The French ambassador added, that Mr. Agathya being now at this time here, and ready to pass hence to the king of Sweden, with orders from the court of France, that he would write by him to Mr. Treslon, to press the king of Sweden, to declare himself in this point, whether he will be content to admit the ministers of this state as mediators. I did not think fit for my own part to declare so much; yet I have written to Sir Philip Meadows, and inclosed to him copies of the French ambassador's and my memorials concerning this business, and of the answers of the states given to us, giving him also an account of this conference, and what the states desired; but I have not heard from him since his last entering into Zeeland.

The admiralties of Amsterdam are heaping together great quantities of materials for building more men of war; and they talk high there of building 30 sail of new frigates; but as yet there's no resolution taken by the states for that effect: but as matters go between this and the next assembly of the states of Holland, so accordingly will this matter be; and I thought it my duty to give you notice of the first beginnings of any thing in this kind. There was a report, which was spread very strongly in Amsterdam the last week, that the soldiery at London have taken the body of his highness out of his grave, declaring they would keep it till they were satisfied their arrears; and this was affirmed by one, who said he was then at London, and saw it.

The order for debarqueing the 4000 men was to this purpose, and with this clause: That yet they should keep themselves in readiness upon call; but yet such a number of men cannot be sent away without a considerable time and ado. I pray be pleased to send me a

^{lord Nieuport's} copy of 527 memorial, wherein he desired the stopping of ^{Ascue,} 217 259 40, &c. according to the

^{Zeeland,} 7th article of the treaty of peace: there are some of 558, that do earnestly desire it; for ^{Nieuport denies it;} that 527 263 393 287 71 146; and I know it may be of very good use, when these matters shall come in debate.

^{she} 139 324 was wont, upon all occasions, to do the contrary in a very invective manner. The resident of Denmark coming the other day to see me, we had much discourse about their affairs. He is full of apprehensions, that his highness will press that peace upon the foot of the treaty of Rochfield, than which, said he, no warr can be worse for his master. And among other things he told me, that he had received a letter from their resident at London, wherein he gave him an account at large of the interment of his late highness, and how that himself with other residents were put to go after the barons (a thing, he said, not usual to residents of crowned princes); and that thereupon he had retired with the residents of Venice and Florence. He shewed me also a large letter written about this matter to the king of Denmark; and in fine desiring, that seeing he could not enjoy the respects, which were due to his quality, that he would be pleased to revoke him, and send some other in his place, whose person might be more acceptable.

^{Colonel Sidney} 254 365 390 81 140 336 390 169 beleeves, that ^{this calling of a parliament in} 469 245 81 362 105 54 408 16

The thaw continues still, and hath continued these eight days; but yet notwithstanding, the people are running upon the ice; and ships cannot yet go to sea from Amsterdam.

The ministers of Brandenburg do highly publish, that the 17th of this month the troops under the command of their master have made themselves masters of Alsen and Sunderburg, the Swedes having quitted them, and retreated in 6 ships. They say, they have taken 1000 horses, but only 30 prisoners; and that the Danish vice-admiral Breda was killed

A.D. 1658. in this encounter. Thorn yet holds out. You will perceive by the inclosed from Paris, that there is a Holland ship taken by an English ship, and carried to Toulon, and there sold; and, speaking this morning with de Witt, I find that I shall have a complaint made to me about it, upon the account of the goods having been unladen and sold before and without any sentence of any court of admiralty. I had a letter from Amsterdam written to one of my company, wherein the owners themselves say, that the ship came from the Spanish West-Indies, and was unloading in Spain; which, if the goods had belonged to the Hollanders, could not well have been; but by the same letter I find, that the ship is very rich, having four last of silver on board her, besides other quantities of very rich merchandizes to a very great value. Men do much wonder here, that England should so strongly and resolutely back the king of Sweden. They say, that assuredly the said king must have granted to his highness's subjects some very great privileges in point of traffick; and it's much talked of, that Cronenburg castle shall be put into his highness's hands. I pray your thoughts upon Dr. Zas's commission, that it may be dispatched and sent me; and am,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Hague, Dec. 27th, 1658. N. S.

Your most faithful humble servant,

G. DOWNING.

The English resident in Holland, to the states general.

Vol. lxii. p. 507.

THE underwritten resident of England, &c. represents to the states general of the United Provinces, that having received their resolution of the 2d of November last past, in answer to his memorial of the same date concerning the ships Society, and the Love and Friendship, taken by private men of war of Ostend, and carried to Delffiel in the province of Groninguen, the masters of the said ships did thereupon repair to the admiralty of Harlinguen, not doubting but to obtain a ready restitution of their ships and goods; but instead thereof, after most clear and evident proof, that 550 planks and 800 barrel-staves had been taken out of the said ship Society, the said admiralty gave leave to the Ostender to carry her away to sea again. And as to the Love and Friendship, the master thereof hath receiv'd from the said admiralty for answer, that if he hath any thing to pretend, he may proceed in the ordinary way of justice; which answer seems very strange to him the said resident, who doth suppose the admiralties to be the ordinary and proper judges appointed by the placarts of their lordships the states general for matters of this kind, and that this matter was not then to begin to be pleaded, but had for many months been depending in process before them, and the charges of this process had much surmounted the sum, for which the said master could have redeemed her with her lading from the said Ostender; and the matter of fact complained of had been proved before them by the confession of the parties themselves, that had bought the said ship and goods; and this after, and contrary to publick warning given them; and that one sentence had been already given by the said admiralty in the case, and an appeal from the said sentence; and complaint thereon made by him the said resident in his above-mentioned memorial, and a resolution taken thereupon of the same date by their lordships the states general to the said admiralty; so that nothing but a full and final sentence, in favour of the proprietors of the said ship, was to have been or could have been expected from them.

And seeing that it hath pleased their lordships so far to take to heart the very great and daily sufferings of the subjects of his master in this kind in these provinces, as to publish their placarts for the prevention thereof for the future, and redress of what is past, the benefit whereof the subjects of his master have since received upon divers occasions, in the provinces of Holland and Zeland; the said resident doth expect, that their lordships will make such reflections upon this matter, as that the same justice may be done in the provinces of Frise and Groninguen, notwithstanding whatever may be the particular interest or influence of any person or persons concerned in this matter, as having bought the said ship and goods.

And the said resident doth further represent, that the fore-mentioned Ostender having put to sea with the ship Society from Delffiel, by the leave and permission of the admiralty of Harlinguen aforesaid, took the confidence (having found so great favour and indulgence there) to come in with her to Saerдам in North Holland, and there unladen her; which being discovered, and complaint thereof made to the admiralty of North Holland, they forthwith, with much readiness, made seizure of her and her lading.

And the said resident doth earnestly demand, that it would please their lordships to take such order, that the said ships and loadings may be forthwith really and effectually restored their said masters; and that little which is left them for their maintenance with their families, will not be consumed in a further fruitless and tedious attendance. A.D. 1658.

Given at the Hague, the 26th of December, 1658. [N. S.]

The states resolution, in answer to the abovementioned memorial.

27th December, 1658. [N. S.]

THERE have been read in the assembly a certain memorial of the Sieur resident Downing, containing his requests, that the two English ships called the Society, and the Love and Friendship, taken heretofore by the private men of war of Ostend, and carried to Delfsiel, may be restored to the masters and owners of them, according to the resolution of their high mightinesses of the second of November last; whereupon, after deliberation, it hath been found good, that there be sent to the province of Groninguen the placart of their high mightinesses of the 9th of August last; also a copy of their letter of the 7th of November following, written to the colleges of the admiralties respectively, touching the prizes taken on sea from the allies and neutrals of this state, and carried into these provinces; as also a copy of the said memorial, with order that they will, for what concerns the said ship, according to the zeal of the provinces of Holland and Zeland, cause the business to go on before the ordinary judge in their jurisdiction, according to the tenor of the said placart, as also according to the will and intention of their high mightinesses, contained more at large in the said letter: and, of this resolution a copy shall be sent to the said resident Downing, to serve him for information. Vol. lxii. p. 509.

Intelligence.

Hague, 27th December, 1658. [N. S.]

PRINCE Maurice of Nassau demanded of the states recruits for the garison of Wesell, whereof he is governor, because the Papist electors, who lately leagued, have a design to attack it. The states intend to send to the king of Sweden, so soon as they shall be assured he will accept mediation from this state. It will be the month of February before they can go hence. The Spanish embassador shall be here next monday. The ministers of Brandenburg have here published, that the 17th instant their master took the isle of Alsen, and the city of Sonderbourg, that the Swedes have left, and are retreated in 6 Swedish ships. The electoral forces have taken but 30 Swedes with a thousand horse. The Danish vice-admiral Bredal is slain by the Swedes. Colonel Killigrew is returned, and hath put into garison the three thousand men designed for relief of the king of Denmark. Vol. lxii. p. 532.

Paris, 27th December, 1658. [N. S.]

THE secretary of the count de Pegnararda was privately with Monsieur de Lionne at Lyons, till the duke of Savoy was gone; and then he went openly to the cardinal Mazarin: and since he is gone to Milan, he hath discoursed about the place where the plenipotentiaries of both crowns are to meet in Germany, and some other preliminaries for the negotiation of peace, which might be done this winter. It is certain also, that there is some treaty of peace between Spain and England; and, in a few days, we shall see the success of either. There is at court an envoy from Portugal, to pray the king to make a diversion, by sending twelve thousand foot and four thousand horse into Catalonia; and that the king of Portugal will pay them, which the court likes well; but will have the money put into the hands of the king of France's commissioners, and the Portuguese will themselves have the paying of the forces; so that if they continue stiff, nothing is like to be concluded. Cardinal de Retz hath made his peace; he is to continue three years at Rome, to negotiate there for the king, and to enjoy the temporalities of the archbishoprick of Paris. About the end of next month Monsieur de Lionne is to be sent into Spain. Vol. lxii. p. 521.

I have soe farre improved my interest heare for the chusing of parliament-men, such as are honest and well-affected to the government, that I am sorry your letter came soe late, that I cannot assure you of those two gentlemen, Mr. Drury and Mr. Eyre, that you wrote for; because wee had settled our whole businesse before concerning the members of this country, which I have done already, to prevent the shires and townes from engaging to other people; and they desire to have most of their own nation at this time; but they shall be such men, that you may be assured will be very faithfull to this government; but I shall yett try where I can get them in, and I shall speake with the old provost of Edinburgh about it. I desire you will let mee know in your next, to what places those three gentlemen, Mr. Oxborough, Mr. Waller, and Mr. Stuart, you first recommended, belonge; because it will be necessary the townes should know it, when they returne them to parliament; which is all at present from

p. 626.

THIS informant saith, That John Sawyer, master of the Pope's-head tavern in London, is a person publickly known to be disaffected to the present government, and an abettor and an adherer to Charles Stuart's party.

That during the time of the late plot, in the time of his late highness, there were constantly every day several meetings of persons of note of that party, and there continued till unseasonable times of the night.

That

That the said Sawyer liveth in a place, where no watch or guard can come to disturb him, A.D. 1658. having the keys of both the alley gates, within which place he can upon a design lodge two thousand men.

That on the 12th of October last, there being in a riotous manner at his house assembled at one of the clock at night several persons, with weapons, that being demanded to give way to the constables to come and search for suspected persons, he obstinately denied; and when at last entrance was forced by the constable and some soldiers, in a contemptuous manner, (being commanded in the name of his highness to keep the peace) he said to the guard, A turd for you and the power and authority you act by: I defy you all.

These and many other things tending highly to the disturbance of the good peace of this commonwealth will be proved against the said Sawyer by very many persons of very good repute and known integrity.

DEARE SIR,

Ballemaaloe, 18. Dec. 1658.

I presume to trouble your packet with this inclosed.

TO receive the assurance you are recovered, and to receive that good newse from your selfe, Vol. lxii. is a double happyness and obligation; and had you never done any thinge els, I can P. 549. truly say, your life has bine far from beinge barren to me, that you have loded me from time to time with soe many obligations, that I can honnestly aver, I esteeme myself more your debtor then I am to any man livinge, and never received a disobligation from you, but in that expresseion; for I feare you must thinke me very unreasonable, if I can in the least degree immagin you to be what you write.

I am indeed much rejoiced to heare his highness thought fit to call a parliament; and that the councill have advised him to it. I cannot say, that will be our remedy; but I doubt, if that be not, noe thinge will be. I hoped, that would have bin the first thinge done after his highness's death; and 'tis a mercy, that oportunity beinge lost, this has bin recovered. Possibly 'tis the more cleerly to shew us, from what hand it comes. I wish I could as rationally beleeve, that our wounds wil be closed by this parliament, as that they wil be (humanely) incurable, if this parliament doth not heale them. I shall faithfully and cordially doe what lyes in me, wher I have any interrest in Scotland and Ireland, to have none elected but good and sober men, and none sent but thos, who will conscientiously attend their duty ther. I wish they may not be affronted after chosen, and that their reception at Westminster be not the cause, or at least the pretence of som differences, and therby lay engagements of honor upon som to doe that, which mere prudence might well declyne: but perhaps I have more feare then reason in this particular. God grant it!

I am not a little troubled your newse is such, that 'tis not to be written in reference to publicke and private affaires. I blefs God, in this nation we are quiet without petitioninge or meddling with state affaires; and honnest general Monck writes me the like out of Scotland last post; soe that we are sober enough to thinke you halfe mad in England. I beleeve any man, who should offer to disturbe the peace here, will be risen against as a wolfe, we are all such perfect contry men, and lovers of that life. When we sowe wheate, we know we shall reape wheate; but you statesmen, when you sowe one sorte of fruit, often reape another: nay I heare some amongst you are like to reape fruit, whose seed you never sowed, neither will any owne the sowinge of it.

A.D. 1658. Tho' the last parliament I was against major generals, yet now the case is altered, my lord lieutenant haveinge made me a kinde of one in this country; but I decimat noe man, nor make use of any instructions but martiall ones. Therefore if you should be beaten out of the pit, be not affrayd to come amongst us for our names sake; for tho' in England the name of that office was only military, yet it cut deepe upon civills, and was indeed a two-edged sword: ours has a back and an edge, and cuts but one way. I beseech God to cement all your differences; and I beg you to beleve me perfectly and unalterably,

DEARE SIR,

Your most humble, and most faithfull oblidge servant,

Dr. Benj. Whichcot to lord chief justice St. John.

MY LORD,

Vol. lxii.
p. 654.

SINCE your lordship's first letter so farre went out of the way, as to make Scotland the way from London to Cambridge, whence it is now come to hand, I will suppose also, that my letter to your lordship in answere to your second might also mistake its way, though letters goe more certainly from hence to London, than vice versa, becaus here the carrier of the day, to whom certenly they are to be delivered, is better known, and from London hither the carrier is surer then the post, and sometimes also quicker; because sometimes letters are not left at Royston, and sometimes lie there a while. My lord, I cannot understand but that all agree in Mr. secretary; yet I am never confident of ought, that is in the hands of a multitude; yet greater probability and likelihood there cannot be of a thinge, for all pleas, your lordship's recommendation, and the person recommended: but it cannot be brought to issue or trial; for noe newes as yet of the writ. The Irish knight, Sir Anthony Morgan, desistes, since an election is also to be in Ireland; for a second heere is a great uncerteinty. It is the general sence here, one Gremial, who knowes all our affaires, to joine with master secretary, and two or three are pretenders; yet all with submission to Mr. secretary, but in competition with one another. We doe thinke to naturalise Mr. secretary to us, and to make him of our body, by admitting him by proxy to the degree of master of arts, as by our university-statute we are enabled to doe, where persons are upon any account stiled honorable, which preceeding, he is pulchrè eligibilis. My lord, I put your lordship to the trouble of these lines, for your further certioration of your letters received, and my duty performed in pursuite of them. Nothing more can be done, till the precipe come from the sheriffe of the county, to warrant us to proceed to an election; which being once made, I shal soon certify your lordship. And in the meane while, having presented my humble service, I commend your lordship to divine protection.

I have received nothinge from your excellency for some weekes past.

Mr. Thomas Talbott to Secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Vol. lxii.
p. 640.

I TAKE the boldness for to state the case, as it standeth between Mr. Vaughan and the office, concerning your busines of the postage. In the first place, he hath gotten into his hands of your moneys 362 l. 12 s. 2 d. and of the money from the counsell moore than your honour did by your commission allow him, 250 l. and saith, that your honour hath nothing to doe with that money; and hath used all the wayes by letters, that he could, for to hinder the postmasters, that they should not account with your casheare and me, and payd in their money to your cashier; which made most of them for to refuse to accompt and pay in their money to your cashier; and two of them, being of his kindred, are run away with 60 l. and upwards of your honour's money. And according to my orders from your deputies, I turned them out, and placed honest men in their places: and afterwards, on purpose for to interrupt the busines, he, contrary to the knowledge of any in the office, altered the label, and caused the male to be sent to his cousin the former postmaster again. Two or three times he did this, to your farther loss of 3 l. more, and caused the said former postmaster to sue the new postmaster upon an action of 1000 l. and seeing that he could not abide any longer, is fled into England; and there is four more turned out, for refusing to accompt and pay their money to your cashier: and them I sue; and he perswades them to stand out, as they have done to their great cost and charge; whereof now some of them submit. He made all the postmasters for to refuse to accompt and pay in their moneys, until your deputies were forced for to write to every individual postmaster twice; and so after these letters they now conform. Some of the postmasters sent me Mr. Vaughan's letters, forbidding them to accompt with Ed. Billing and myself; which letters I sent up to your deputies, that they might see, that it was time to write, or else we should have had a general disturbance in your busines, which is settled now in a good order. But as for Mr. Vaughan, he will not own your deputies orders for to be of any validity, but saith, that his commission is as good as theirs; and for want of your honour's commission to Ed. Billing and myself, he hath sued us in two severall actions, of 1000 l. a-piece; and against me he hath declared, a copy whereof I send to your honour. And as for the busines, which is referred to Dr. Dudley Loftus, and Arthur Anslowe esq; they have had severall meetings, and they writ a letter to your honour concerning the counsell's money, which Mr. Vaughan had received, more than his commission gave him power. They did forbear to proceed, until they had received an answer of their letter from your honour's deputies; and now of late they forbear, because he is in prison for debt, and he telleth his creditors, that there is due to him out of the office 300 l. when he hath gotten into his hands of your honour's money far more than his sallary of 200 l. a year cometh to, if that you did allow of to him. The commissioners told him, that they thought it was not your honour's intention for to allow him his sallary of 200 l. a year, and the counsell's money, more than your honour allowed him both by your commission. I have charged him with nothing; but I shall be able for to prove, that he hath refused to let one of your clercks have a chamber, when he hath three more than he useth, or is furnished; but taketh in a man and his wife, which are strangers. I suppose that is not your honour's will for to suffer this; for he and his wife live at his farm eight miles off, and he cometh to town once or twice a week, and hath none but a man here, and keepeth five rooms and a cellar in his hands. All this he does in a malicious way, until your honour's pleasure be further known. I am sure, that I have saved your honour 400 l. a year, and have composed your post-roads in a better way, and drawn many branches into the severall roads, with small charge; and I am a settling of more into the county of Mayo. Your honour's acte is very lame as to Ireland; for here is a great abuse by shipping, in bringing over over and carrying back of a world of letters; and by private foot-posts, which hinders the office 500 l. a year. Your honour will see, that as Ireland plants, your office will grow every year better. I have many more things for to acquaint your honour withal; but I fear that I have been too troublesome. I humbly beg your honour's favour, and am

shalsea of this court, being of a plea of trespass on the case, &c. Vol. lxii. p. 644.

For that, whereas the letter-office, otherwise called the post-office, is, and from the time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary, is an antient office; and that John Thurloe esq; principal secretary of estate to his late highness Oliver lord protector of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, was lawfully seized of the said office, and of all the vades, fees, perquisites, and profits thereunto belonging, as of his freehold, to continue for and during his natural life; the said office to be exercised, and the said vades, fees, profits, and perquisites thereof to be received by himself, or by his sufficient deputy or deputies in that behalf in the said dominions and territories, or in any or either of them: and the said John Thurloe being so seized of the said office on the seven and twentieth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand six hundred and fifty-six, at the city of Dublin, in the parish of St. Michael the archangel, in the ward of St. Michael, in the county of the said city; and within the jurisdiction of this court, did lawfully constitute and appoint the said Evan Vaughan his lawful deputy, to exercise the said office in and throughout the whole dominion of Ireland, and to take up, receive, and levy all the vades, fees, profits, and perquisites to the said office belonging, in the said dominion, to the use of the said John Thurloe, his executors, administrators, and assigns, upon accompt therefore and thereout to be given to the said John Thurloe, his executors, administrators, or assigns, by the said Evan Vaughan, when the said Evan Vaughan should be thereunto required; deducting and saving thereout unto the said Evan Vaughan the annual sum of 200 l. sterling, for the said Evan Vaughan's yearly salary for exercising the said office; by force of which deputation the said seven and twentieth day of June, 1656, above-said, at the said city of Dublin afore-said, in the parish, ward, and county afore-said, and within the jurisdiction afore-said, the said Evan Vaughan did enter into and become possessed of the said office, with the appurtenances, upon accompt as afore-said, deducting unto him the said Evan the yearly salary afore-said: all which notwithstanding the said Thomas Talbot being not ignorant of, but well knowing the premises, craftily, cunningly, and subtly intending and endeavouring to defraud and deceive the said John Thurloe of the vades, fees, profits, and perquisites of the said office, and altogether to disable and debar the said Evan Vaughan from accompting with the said John Thurloe for the same, and to defeat and defraud the said Evan from the said salary; he the said Thomas Talbot, the thirtieth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand six hundred fifty-six afore-said, at the city of Dublin, in the parish, ward, and county afore-said, and within the jurisdiction afore-said, of his own wrong, and without any colour of right, from the said thirtieth day of December in the year afore-said, hath taken and received, and to his own use converted, all the vades, fees, profits, and perquisites of the said office in the dominion of Ireland afore-said, and yet doth take, receive, and to his own use convert, the vades, fees, profits, and perquisites of the said office; whereby the said Evan Vaughan, tho' often thereunto required by the said John Thurloe, is not able to render any accompt of the said vades, fees, profits, and perquisites to the said John Thurloe as afore-said, and whereby the said Evan Vaughan is defeated of the said yearly salary of 200 l. sterling, from the said twenty-seventh day of June, in the year of our Lord 1656 afore-said, hitherto; all which the said Evan Vaughan is ready to verify, &c. with that, that the said John Thurloe is yet living, and in full life, at Dublin afore-said, in the parish, ward, and county afore-said, within the jurisdiction afore-said. Whereupon he saith, that he is the worse, and hath damage, to the value of 1000 l. sterling; and thereof he bringeth suit, &c.

A.D. 1658. THE writts are now gone forth to all parts of the three nations, and I hope more care will be taken than usually, that honest, peaceable, and godly-minded men may be elected in all places. The king of Poland is so much displeased at the late invasiun of his country by the Muscovites, that he is resolved to declare war against them; and to doe it the better, he harkens very much to an accommodation with the king of Sweden. The Poles got together some forces, and so freshly pressed the Muscovites, as they retired from Wilna, that they recovered the generall Gonziowsky, whome they had taken, and all the rest of their prisoners; and they are resolved soe to pursue this warr, that the generall Sophia shall presently be sent with a good army one way, whilst the Cossaks make an inroade another way. And of this the king of Poland hath sent advice to the emperor, that he may be informed, that the Muscovites were the first breakers of the late treaty begunne betwixt them.

From Amsterdam the last letters import, that since the staying the intended releif of four thousand men for the Danish service, and haveing a true understanding of the state of affaires at Copenhagen, they are thinkeing how to peice up the busines betwene the Swedes and Danes; and are nominating ambassadors to goe to the king of Sweden, to revive the treaty of Elbing. The duke of Brandenburg is at Flensburg, expecting barques to transport 4000 foot and 3000 horse to Zealand: but the Swedes are well provided with horse to receive them, and expect a reinforcement of seven thousand foot from Schonen.

There is nothing come by this post from Flanders or France, worth your excelencie's knowledge; and from Portugall the Spanish newes of the takeing of Yelvas is contradicted. I am,

THE person your highness sent over, arrived on the 16th of this month; and tho' I have been confined to my chamber ever since his coming, through that indisposition, which hath hung upon me for severall months past, yet I have, as my condition would bear it, given him opportunity. I perceive by your highness's letter, that you committed what you would should be communicated to me, to this person; and I have accordingly credited all he delivered; and beleiving him to deserve the character your highness gives him, have entrusted him with whatsoever I desire he should say to your highness touching my coming over. As for other matters, wherein I have occasionally discoursed my opinion with him, I desire your highness to look upon them as coming from a stranger to things and persons there. IHAVE discoursed with this bearer concerning the matter committed to him by his highness, who, I suppose, will give you an account of what I have said to him upon that subject. I must endeavour in all things to submit to the will of God, and be passive in such things, as shall be put upon me by my superiours, though never so much to my own prejudice. I MUST thank you, that you are pleased to keep your constant correspondence with me, notwithstanding my late silence, which truly hath been upon no other account than that, which hath indisposed me to all manner of busines. And truly I thought a little recess and my country air might have given me some relief; but I see now I have no other remedy, but to trust myself upon the good providence of God. And though I make this complaint to you, yet I am far from thinking you in the least accessary to it; and I hope, when you see it seasonable, you will (notwithstanding all the obstructions it hath met with hitherto) do the part of a friend. I pray God to direct you in all your weighty affairs; and that these nations may reap some advantage from that great meeting, which is now approaching.

Instructions for Will. lord Lockhart, governour of our garrison Dunkirke.

WHEREAS we have upon advice with our counsell lately resolved of the severall matters following, in relation to our service in Flaunders, you are therefore to put in execution the instructions after-mentioned.

I. We send you herewith an establishment for the severall forces belonging to our garrisons of Dunkirk, and Mardyke, and fort Oliver; which you are to take notice of, and proceed accordingly in all matters relating to our said forces.

II. Towards the compleating of the number of our said established forces, you are to call into your garrison of Dunkirke the said supernumerary companies of English, which are now in the service of the king of France, in his field army.

III. For the further compleating thereof we have designed five hundred soldiers, either of those, which we have determined to spare out of our English regiment, whereof 400 to be sent from hence, and the other hundred to be made up out of col. Salmon's and col. Guibon's companies, now in Flaunders; and accordingly fifty relating to each of their regiments are to be continued in Flaunders for that end.

IV. Upon the landing of the said 400 men in Flaunders, you are to send back in the same ships, that transport them, so many of the said companies of col. Salmon's and col. Guibon's regiments (excepting the fifty of each, which are to stay behind, as aforesaid) as may with convenience be therein embarked; and the residue of the said companies in such other vessells as shall be appointed for that purpose by commands of our admiralty and navy.

V. You are from time to time, by such persons as you shall think fit, to transact for such proportions of hay, as shall from time to time be necessary for supply of our regiment of horse

A.D. 1658. horse at Dunkirke; the charge whereof is to be defray'd out of the moneys allowed on our establishment for pay of the said regiment.

VI. You are to cause duplicates under the hand of the commissary of the musters, of all the muster-rolls of our horse and foot forces in Flaunders, to be from time to time sent over to our privy counsell.

VII. For supply of the horses, that shall from time to time die in our service, in case you shall see cause to continue the person, whose horse shall so die in our service, you are to give your certificates from time to time in that behalf, that liberty may be given such person to transport such other horse as he shall provide, which we intend to be custome-free.

VIII. You are hereby empower'd to cause the magistrates of our town of Dunkirke to be elected in the usual manner, taking care therein, that our own and the English interest be provided for, as far as may be consistent with the articles of the surrender.

IX. You are also hereby left at liberty to make such agreement with the inhabitants of Nieuport and Ostend for liberty of fishing on that coast, as you shall judge reasonable, and agreeable to the constitution of affairs.

SIR,

24. Decemb. 1658.

Vol. lxii.
p. 682.

THE last week's post came not until monday, and the post of this week is already come; so that I have two of your letters to answer together. By yours of the 1^o/₂^oth I perceive, that the express sent to you by the frigate is arrived with you, and that you have not thought fit to put in any new paper into the states upon the directions you then received, in respect of the resolution, which the states had taken before those directions came to your hands concerning those three ships. You will perceive by my last letters, that that resolution gives no more satisfaction here, then their former did. And in truth, there is no more said in this, then there was in the former; and I do really believe, that if some more effectual course be not taken, the merchants will either have no restitution, or such one as is as bad as nothing. And therefore as you are instructed by my last letters, his highness desires you to continue your diligence for the obtaining the restitution of the two ships you mention taken by the Ostenders. I will do my best endeavours as concerning the ship called the Reade, or Peace. The frigate is not yet returned; so that we hear nothing of what you writt by her.

You will receive herewith a copie of my lord Nieuport's paper concerning Sir George Ascue, as also Dr. Zaz his commission. My last gave you a full answer concerning Sidney, which is to his satisfaction. As to the putting in a new memorial, further to invite the states to the mediation, I think it is a little to be considered of before we put the intended treaty upon that bottom, lest the king of Sweden's refusing to admit their mediation, and our too far insisting upon it, should hinder the peace between the two crowns. And it is to be feared the Dutch have only agreed to this way of treaty, upon consideration, that the king of Sweden will not accept of it; and therefore, as it is a thing very desirable to have the help of the states general in the intended treaty, yet it must not be made the causa sine qua non. We having already done our parts to invite them, I do not see what the advantage will be of further insisting on it, if the states mean plainly in what they say; if otherwise, 'tis not good to give them any advantage. We have no news from the Sound, but what I find in yours. Every body is attending the election for the parliament; of which you shall have a more ample account by the next. I rest your very affectionate friend and servant,

JO. THURLOE.

Secretary Thurloe to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

WE E minde here nothinge but the elections to the next parlament, which by what already In the posses-appears of them, they are like to consist of men of various principles, and various sion of the apprehensions. Wee and they are all in the hands of God, who (I hope) will be yet merci- right honour-ful to us, and lengthen out the dayes of our tranquillity and peace. There are noe motions able the earl in the left manner in the army; yet certeinly there are dissatisfactions in some. Things of Shelburn.
seeme sometymes to be skinned over, but breake out againe. For the present, all is husht, in expectation of what the parlement will doe. Some very considerable persons, who have a great interest, and are of much esteeme in the nation, professe themselves ready to use all their endeavours to settle thinges, and to oppose all spirits and persons, that out of discontent will bringe us into confusion; and I beleve they will be hearty in it.

Our fleet is returned from the North, not beinge able, by reason of the ice, to get into the Sound: but the Dutch haveinge stopt their new supplies, and declared themselves willinge to endeavour a peace betweene the two kinges, the greatest effect of sendinge the fleet is obteyned; and the kinge of Sweden beinge also in a good condition, and will hold out this winter. I have nothinge else to trouble your excellency with, but to subscribe my-

Your EXCELLENCY'S most humble servant,

JO. THURLOE.

Dr. Clarges to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

I SUPPOSE by that time this comes to your excellency's hands, Dr. Petty will be In the posses-arrived at Dublin, whoe can more at large informe your excellency of the state of our sion of the affaires heere then is fit to put in writing. I believe there was never more care taken in the right honour-elections for members to sitt in parliament, then at this time, to have such chosen as are able the earl of peaceable and healing spirits; but yet I am informed, some of the eminentest of contrary of Shelburn. inclinations will get in. The house of lords is that, which many aprehende with much trouble. They are to be the same persons, that were summoned before; and I feare will produce the same consequences, except the Lord dispose mens minds to much compliance.

Our fleet, that went towards the Sound, is returned, being hindred by the ice to prosecute their intended voyage; and I feare the king of Sweden's condition is made much worfe by it; from whence I (haveing heard nothing by the last) am able to give your excellency no other account then what is in the publique print.

The merchants in this city discourse much of a peace with Spaine, and expect it from the parliament, which does not a little alarme the French; for they publish in their common newes, that wee are allready in treaty with the Spaniards. The truth is, that though many times little regard is had of towne-talke, yet sometimes from thence the nicest states take their measures. It is very much suspected, that the king of France and cardinal Mazarine are leaning towards a treaty with Spain, in which the emperour and the Catholique electors strongly interesse themselves, there being at Lyons a currier from the emperour, whoe passed that way to Spaine; and the weeke before Piemontelli came from Spaine, and vissitted the king and cardinale privately in his passage to Milan. I beleive the court of France may be as well induced to peace with the house of Austria, from the condition of their affaires at home as abroad; for the French provinces are of late much disquieted by reason of the extraordinary impositions continued and increased upon them; and the prince

A.D. 1658. of Condé's freinds (who are of the most considerable persons in France) are not idle to foment all occasions, that may necessitate the king to the generall peace. I am,

DEARE BROTHER,

In the possession of the right honourable the earl of Shelburn.

I HAVE not heard from you thes two or three posts. I will not adventure the trouble of many lines to you, saving to expresse a desire of a true through understanding, love, and affection 'twixt us, which I know is by some looked upon as a complement between us, and not reall; which if it find the same heartynes in yourselfe, or endeavor, as I hope it shall in me, we shall then both, I hope, have the mercy ourselves in the injoyment thereof, deserve others, and be better able to serve the publicke. I hope you in this think I have no unworthy designe: I presume I am better beleived and thought on. I mention the more often this, because I have reason to suspect some are not freinds to our cordyall freindshippe, in which I desire it may be founded more upon principles then other politicke considerations: the one will maintain it, when the other fayles. We are lik to have a day of much tryall; the Lord fit us with hearts futable to what he may see good to bring upon us: an intire close communion with the Lord will be our best preservative. The severall shakings we have seen in the world, may well teach us, how an uncerteine abiding-place we have heare; and indead nothing will helpe us through what we are like to meet with, but a gracious presance of the Lord; and therfor to doe nothing to provoake his withdrawing, should be the great desire of our soules. I am very much importuned by my lord Moore's sollicitor to beseech the continuance of your favor, in the forbearance of what is the demands from him of the second moyty. We have yet very few chosen in the countreys or boroughs. The Lord dispose that great affayre to the aunfwering of thos great designes, which we have bine carrying on in this day; which that we may find, is the desire of

SIR,

In the possession of the right honourable Philip ld. Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain.

BY the inclosed you will see how the election is like to be at Cambridge. The election at Huntington is like to be on thursday next; and I beleive yourselfe and my sonn Bernard will be chosen there. They tell me heare att Petersburgh, they intend my sonn and major Blague. Sir, in my laist I forgot one thing materiall to be well advised on for the parliament, that is, the navie and shipping of England. I had discourse with Mr. Foxcroft about it, and made him promise me to acquaynte you with it, and by advise with some of his brethren to draw up the matter into four or five heads, of the abuses and remedies. He tells me, that almost all the merchants begin to trade in Dutch bottoms. The consequence, you know, will be noe lesse, then that in a shorte time we shall have noe ships of our owne; and of the transportation of woolls. Consider likewise the minte, and how bullion may be brought hether, and the exchange. Sir, I intende, God willing, the next weeke after this that's coming, to set fourth for London. I rest

THIS informant saith, that he coming to the town of Burish, or Burwash, in the county of Suffex, to the Star there, upon the seventh or eighth day of this instant December; at which time there was one Mr. Walter Hyam, that liveth at Itchingham in the said county, then at the Bear in Burish aforesaid; and hearing this informant was at the Star, came from the other house to him: and as they were here sitting at the Star by the fire-side, drinking, the said Mr. Hyam asked him, what news at London? And he answered, there was a flying news, as if there would be a difference between us and the Dutch this summer following: to which Mr. Hyam replied, and told this informant, we should have a war in England this next summer. And this informant asking him the reason why he said so, he answered, he the said Hyam had two or three commissions at home concerning it, and had weekly intelligence besides from the same parties, from whom he had the commissions: and when he had spoken so, he desired this informant not to publish or reveal it again; which if this informant did, he swore he was utterly undone. MY LORD,

I RECEIVED your letter of the twenty-fourth instant, by which I understand, it is his highness's pleasure, that I should continue heere in Scotland; which I doe willingly obey, and thinke it will bee most for the publique service at present soe to doe. Wee have little newes heere, but that there are some Scotchmen, which endeavour to write to their freinds in Scotland, to chuse Scotchmen, and not Englishmen. MOST SERENE GREAT DUKE,

IT appears to me, that my letter to your serene highness was misunderstood. I never questioned your highness's justice, nor your court's, which are very eminent for distributive right. That which by order of my master I now demand, is of another nature, and judged by him not equitable, his subjects should be put upon tedious courses of law, for what was taken from them without either colour or ground of the same, in remote parts of the world, by your highness's commission. The employment I have from my master carries, I hope, sufficient, to cause me to be believed, when I speak in his name; nor should I undertake a business of this nature, but by his expresse command, which is the cause I trouble your serene highness again; beseeching, you will be pleased to say, whether without putting the interested to recover their right by law, your highness will forthwith command the setter forth of those ships, who did the wrong, to give satisfaction. And this is what my master expects, and myself an answer: for which I send this gentleman, that he may wait on your highness, and assure your serene highness, that I am

SIR,

A.D. 1658. I HAVE received yours of the first September, in favour of Mr. Erisey and his interest in these parts; concerning which, as to what and how acted therein, having given him an ample, and I doubt not but satisfactory account, also (wherewith, if occasion, I presume he will acquaint you) I thinke it impertinent to interrupt your weightier occasions therewith. In a business, where on the one side the title is so cleare and undoubted, as is Mr. Erisey's; and on the other, the obligation so greate, to see him righted as on myne, I would not be thought to need the suggestion of any for the due discharge of myselfe therein, or to have done that at your request, which reason and justice exacts from mee, to colour that a courtesy, which is so plaine a debt. Wherefore, Sir, could wish you would please to try my obedience and respects in some such thing, as may have no other force upon me, but what the virtue of your commands giveth it; or I any other obligations to serve you therein, then such as you have been pleased already to lay upon,

MY lord keeper and myself have done our best to get those men chosen you have wrote for; but my lord of Argyll, and some others, whome my lord keeper will acquaint you with, have endeavoured all they can, to gett all Scotchmen chosen. But I doubt not but there will bee three chosen of those five you sent the names of; and I have taken care, that as many as come out of this country, shall bee there with the first: and if the writs come in time, which I hope they will, they shall bee all sent to Dr. Clarges. The mar-quesse of Argyle himself indeavours to bee chosen, notwithstanding hee is sheriff of Argyleshire; neither doe I guess hee will doe his highness's interest any good; but when my lord keeper comes up, hee shall acquaint you with the businesse. MY LORD,

I RECEIVED yours; but before it came to hand, my lord generall and myselfe had joyned in letters to severall gentlemen for severall shires and boroughs, that wee thought wee might most easily prevayl with for those gentlemen your lordship had nominated to him, viz. Mr. Deury, Mr. Oxborough, Mr. Eyre, and Mr. Stuart; as also for som other gentlemen som other honourable persons in England had commended to the generall; the most of which I hope shall be elected. And truly I beleve hardly any would have fayled, had not some persons here (that have cause enough to be fast friends) laboured to counteract us. But had I received your last very litle sooner, I should have gott in coll. Mills: for without complement, I am very ambitious to serve you, though in these cases it is more a service to the commonwealth; upon which ground my lord generall and myselfe have done what we can, though others be angry at it. If God please to send a good issue, it will not repent any, who have been industrious upon so speciall occasion, where the nation's peace and well-being lyes at stake. Myselfe was chosen yesterday for Edinburghshire: and though I am unfit for a winter jorneye, but much more for service in a parliament, yet I intend, God willing, to set forward about ten dayes hence; and wee have taken what care wee can, that those, that shall be chosen to come from hence, may be speeded away. Secretary Thurloe to the borough of Tewksbury.

GENTLEMEN,

I RECEIVED yours of the seventeenth instant, and thereby a very great demonstration of your affection to me, haveinge expressed your willingnes not only to betrust your concernment in the parliament with me, but to have regard to my recommendation of him, whom you are to choose for your other burgesse. I heartily wish, that my ability to serve your corporation in the parliament, and elsewhere, were answerable to the good opinion you have of me. All that I can say is, that I shall endeavour, as I am obliged, to serve you faithfully, hopeinge you will doe yourselves more right in your choice of my partner, then you have in pitching upon me; knoweing you have many able gentlemen, both in the country, and amongst yourselves, very fit for that trust. My lord Disbrowe tells me, he hath propounded a worthy person, whose recommendation will make it necessary for me to make use of the liberty you have pleased to give.

31. Decemb. 1658.

Mr. Nic. Blake to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

UNDERSTANDING lately of an Englishman come to Holland, that not long since came from Spayne and from the court, I accosted him first with a letter of civillity, and proffers of kindnes; and the next weeke I desired him to certify mee a few queries, to which I by this weeke's post received answer. The coppie of the queries, and the answer, I have heerewith sent your lordship; and if you think fitt to order mee to make any demands, have as candid an answer as he can give mee.

In the time of your lordship's sicknes, I had somewhat to present unto your view; but not thinking it a fitt season to trouble you with matters then, and finding an oportunity to present some papers to his highnes by the meanes of a gentleman wayting on his person, I put them in, and doe imagin, they are scarce seen yet on the inside; and his highnes expressed a desire, that I should communicate them to you: but the papers remain in his highnes hands still; which if you please to mention, and that you will spare a quarter of an hower's time to peruse and digest the thing, I imagin that you may find a harmlesse, yet a full contrivance, how to fadome the intentions of Spayne, and feele how their pulse beats, without spyes, or any such way, all to be done above-bord, with an open face; and the losse of reputation (if any bee) shall fall on the Spaniards side, in relation of being the first motioner towards a treaty. If my fancy doe not hitt right with your better judgment, I am verry ready not to thinke any more of it, and shall beg you . . . bee put on the score of desire I have, that all may bee well. If it shall merit your concurrence, I shall esteeme the invention so much the happyer. In all kinds I shall desire to bee always found and esteemed

YOUR LORDSHIP'S most humble servant,

London, 31. Dec. 1658. at night.

NICHOLAS BLAKE.

Inclosed in the preceding.

SIR,

London, 3. Dec. 1658.

YOUR cominge lately from the courte of Spaine, can (I presume) in a good measure give an account and relation how matters fadge there, in what is the national affair, in relation to the war with us; as, whether the king of Spain and his counsell be weary of the war, and consequently would willingly make up a peace; and to that end, whether you have heard, that any motion is like to come from thence, of peace; or what you have heard of their inclinations this way. Also I pray you hint me, when you think they expect the galleons home; and likewise how the king of Scotts's embassador is received there and maintained; whether or no he have the same privileges now, as the embassadors of the kings of England used to have. In like manner, I pray, write me, how Spain affects the friendship with Holland, who, we presume, suck much juice and marrow, and now

A.D. 1658. make their harvest on the Spaniard; and advise me, who is the chief secretary at court. I desire you would favour me with your answer; in which you will much oblige me.

Vol. lxii.
P. 732.

AFFAIRS in Spain stand in so desperate a condition, as they are now come to nil ultra; all the hopes of recuperation left them depending upon a supposed good success of their galleons safe arrival, which is the only anchor they now trust to, to imagine themselves in a means of salvation, and upon which score the Afflictists have racked their purses and credits, to make new supplies reach for the subsistence in Flanders, and the domestic quarrel entertained 'twixt them and Portugal. Their engagement with England, and the unsavory consequence, which it hath produced them, hath brought to such a feeling sense of their own weakness, as 'tis generally supposed, no conditions, if treated, would seem too bitter or fastidious to their acceptance; the efficacious certainty of their adage (con todo el mundo guerra, y paz con Ynglaterra) having never been so apparent unto them, as now, and would make any notion of treaty most welcome to them; which is the opinion of most of their (communicable) ministers, whom in several occasions I had free access unto; though of their first proposition for it I never yet understood any thing in Spain, it being somewhat opposite to their gravity to crave first, especially having great confidence from their galleons, as the only prop left them to keep them from a violent general inundation.

The plate-fleet, according to the most reasonable calculation, was expected home in all the month of January, wherein they purpose to have eighteen millions for the king's score, and twelve millions upon particular mens; which will be a great help to their state compliance: though there went a very hard report, that the consejo de Hazienda had resolved to seize upon the particular interest, and give them satisfaction, half in old juros and consignations, and half in the new money. Time will certainly tell us the event. The English agent in Madrid lives rather as a private gentleman, than a public minister, and hath so small authority among them, as he never had yet the confidence to assist nor help any pretender of our nation, in order to the recovery of their lost estates, or new liberties, tho' many of them have been back'd with passports and other instruments of favour from these parts for their furtherance. He is allowed 400 ducats Vellon for his house, a coach with two mules, and a dispense for the freeness of all excise in his domestic necessities, which yields him two hundred ducats more per month, rented to a third person, which is his chief subsistence. The chief secretary of state and dispatch universal is Don Fernando Fonseca Ruis de Contreras, marquez de la Pilla, who hath supplied Don Luis de Haro's absence in this Portugal engagement, and is now the second man at court. The friendship with Holland is very certainly more out of necessity, than any affection the Spaniards bear them, professing an inveterate antipathy to that nation, and now make their harvest upon Spain, in this interval, that we are denied free footing among them.

General Montagu to secretary Thurloc.

MY LORD,

I HUMBLY thanke you for yours of the thirtieth past. This weeke hath produced the election of our burrough of Huntington, Mr. John Bernard cominge hither from Thorpe on thursday last, on purpose to be present at it; and they have beene so bold as to presume upon your name in their choise, and yesterday did with greate alacritye choose yourselfe and Mr. John Bernard. If you blame them, I must take my share, as a hearty well-willer to it and to you; yet desiringe in nothinge to disserve you, but with all affection and faithfullnesse approve myselfe, Coll. Walton came this day, and dined with mee, and told mee, he came to take off A.D. 1658. prejudices, and to lett mee know his principles were not such, as they might be represented; and that he was firme to his highnesse, and not for a commonwealth-government, and in divers other particulars discourfed very orthodoxly. He intends to stand. I carry it faire, but interest myselfe for none, nor will, unless Mr. Cromwell be in hazard; and in that case I will be active, that he receive noe affront.

Mr. Ralph Cudworth to secretary Thurloe.

HONOURED SIR,

THOUGH I do not question, but you have ere this received from the vice-chain-Vol. lxiii. cellor an account of our election of burgeses for the univerfity lately made, and thatp. 10. yourfelfe was unanimoufly and with general confent chosen in the first place, we being all very glad, that there was a person of fo much worth, and fo good a friend to the univerfity and learning, as yourfelfe, whom we might betrust with the care of our priviledges and concernments; yet I thinke it not unseasonable to let you understand something concerning the second choice, that was then made of a gentleman, that perhaps may be a stranger to you, that lives upon the place.

It was the opinion of divers of the heads and others, when we received the first tidings of a parliament, that it would be convenient for the univerfity to choofe one of their burgeses a gremiall, or one, that living amongst us, was well acquainted with the state of things here, and one that would be vacant to attend our concernments, as occasion might be offered. Whereupon this gentleman was first thought upon, as being most in view.

But after that most had ingaged their thoughts upon him, conceiving him a person very fitly qualified, it happened, that some few days before the election, Mr. Bacon's name was started by some, who is a person fo well knowne amongst us, and fo highly esteemed, that if there had been the least hint given, that it would be acceptable to him at the beginning, when men were unengaged, he would (notwithstanding that confideration before-mentioned) have certainly been chosen, without any dispute, next yourfelfe, before any other. But most of the univerfity being pre-engaged, when his name was first started, they could not in ingenuity do otherwise than they did; which therefore they hope no misconstruction will be made of, the case being really as I have represented. This gentleman, Dr. Sclater, is well known by many of us to be a very ingenious person, of very good abilities, and one, that we doubt not but will readily concurre with such resolutions, as tend to the settlement and establishment of the commonwealth, as well as mind the interest of the univerfity. I shall now only crave pardon for troubling you thus much, and take leave; subscribing myselfe,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

IN obedience to your honour's withoutt date, remitted mee by captain Richard Payne, Vol. lvii. p. 39. The consul I plac't at Tripoly begins to lament the poorenese of the place, in respect to any benefit; and that he will not be able to subsist without some allowances from his highness. I beseech your honour will be a meanes, that some stypend may bee settled, as there is upon him of Argire, it being of no meane importance to keepe those people within the

I AM directed by our company to signifie to your lordship, that upon fryday last, in the forenoone, wee proceeded to the election of two burgeses, to serve in parliament for our burrough of Huntingdon, at which time (with a free and full unanimous consent) were chosen your lordship and Mr. Bernard.

THO. JUDSON, mayor Hunt.

Secretary Thurloe to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburne.

MAJOR Pitman is returned, by whom I had the honour to receive your excellency's letter. He alsoe acquainted me with the discourse, which passed betweene your excellency and him. But he arriveinge here but on saterday night, I have not the opportunitie to speake with his highness, or any body else, upon that subject. In the meane tyme, I am greatly troubled to heare, that your bodily indisposition still continues, and that your excellency speakes of beinge passive and a looker on. I doe verily thinke, that our affaires are such as will require both councell and action. Our enemies on all hands are active, and will leave noe stone unturned to give us trouble both at home and abroad. I finde that there are some men in the nation of the soberer sort, who doe wholly stand still, and care not to be elected, or to engage in affaires. Others, viz. the comonwealth's men, stickle all they can to come into the house; as Sir H. Vane, lieutenant-general Ludlowe, Mr. Nevill, Mr. Scott, &c. I doe not heare, that Vane and Ludlowe are yet chosen; but there is noe doubt to be made but they will come in, and soe will Lambert, who stands for it in some three places. This is like to be a very troublesome scene; and surely things are to be managed with vigour and life on the one side, as well as will be on the other; and I perswade myselfe, God will blesse courage and livelye actions, and will be displeased with dispondencies and melancholy motions. I can say by experience, that I never in all my life made a true judgment of thinges in a melancholy frame and temper of spirit; and whatever measures I tooke, whilst I was in that case, I wholly disliked them, when I was out of it, and have fully resolved with myselfe never to doe any thinge, or take up any resolutions, whilst I am melancholye, haveinge alwaies found my thoughterroneous at such a tyme. The cause is as good as ever, and the same that ever it was, and the enemies are baffled men; and if wee can beleieve, that God will be with us, he will be with us; and who then can be against us?

That, which I most feare, is disunion amongst freinds. There are distances in affection to this house: what that may be the root of, I am not able to say. But there will lye other difficulties, that I foresee; and this none but God can cure; and I am perswaded he will provide a remedy for this evill one way or other, if wee can wayte upon hym.

Wee have noe newes at all from beyond the seas this weeke: this season of the yeare affords it not. I feare they will endeavour to cast out the members of Ireland and Scotland;

land; but I beleve they will be better advised, before they doe it. It is an unplaufible point, and the wiser of them will not attempt it. A.D. 1658.

The other house will be the great question, and that most certainly stickes in the throats of many of our friends. I wish with all my heart wee were well over that. If the foundation were once admitted, it's to be hoped there will be an agreement about the superstructure. But I deteyne your excellency too longe in discourfes of this kinde, haveinge no other matter to enterteyne your excellency with in the knowledge of Whitehall, 4. Jan. 1658.

Your EXCELLENCYE's most humble, faithfull, and obedient servant,

JO. THURLOE.

General Fleetwood to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

DEARE BROTHER,

I RECEIVED your last by Ma. Pitman, which was most wellcom to me, in that you wer pleased to assure me of your confydence. I had no hands in the late buyfness of your stay, which, as it was a right to me, so was it a favor, that you would give credit to what I have sayde therein; and shall, I hope, be found in nothing wanting to expresse that honor and affection, which I have for you; and whilst that freedom is 'twixt us, I hope it shall not be in the power of any to divide us. We are not without hopes the choyce of members may be better then was expected. The Lord hath the hearts of all in his hands, and can dispose them as he pleases; and therfor what we think to be impossible, he can make possible; and therfor in all thes doubtfull cases, the lesse we anticipate providence beforhand, and in faith and prayer wait upon him, the better will it be with us. He hath most appeared, when we have binn least in expectation; however, he reignes, and therfor we may rejoyce. I presume you have heard of Sir Richard Beake's late disapoyntment in his hopes of waiting upon my lady Reynolds, with the grounds of it. I shall rejoyce in his well-doing. I am loath to be troublefom to you; but really the sadde condition of my poore lord Lambert is such, that I cannot but once more importune your favorable justice to his poore and low condition. I have a desire, my lord Fines might heare the buyfness. Collonel Temple being in England, and my cosen Lambert also, I shall hope for your favor in this buyfnes, else his case will be sadde. I did move his highnes, my lord Fines might heare the buyfnes, to which his highnes was free; and therfor beseech you, nothing may be determined against him, till my lord Fines hath had a hearing thereof, which I did speake to collonel Temple, and was satisfied my lord Fines and Sir Matthew Tomlinson shoudl consider the case, which I shall hasten, who am

May it please your EXCELENCY,

THERE is nothing of news from this place relateing to our domestique affaires since my last to your excelency, except the certaine returne of our fleete from the Sound which is come into Harwich shatter'd. In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburn.

The king of France is much inclined to the match with Spaine; and it is said, the cardinall so really intends it, that he designs to bring on a peace that way; but the generall treaty of Ausberg is prosecuted, and marshall Grammont designed for an ambassy thither, at the opening of the spring, which was consented to by the king, at the mediation of the elector of Mentz, to whose secretary, at his parting from Lyons, the cardinal gave a diamond ring worth four thousand crownes. Don John of Austria is on his way to Spaine through France; and he is to stay a few dayes at Paris, to see what is there remarkable, and to lodge, whilst he stayes, in the king's house the Lovre. This great kindness is a symptome of likelyhood of good understanding betwixt the two crowns, but many con-

As I was sealing my letter to your excellency, I had intimation, that Mr. Scot, that mis'd his being chosen at Alsbury, is elected with collonel Bridge to serve for Wickham. I doe not heare Sir Henry Vane is chosen, but I was told Harrison might have had a choice, and refused, pretending a scruple to take the oath required by all members before they sit. I heare also Mr. Nevill indeavours to be chosen in Cornwall.

SIR,

Vol. lxi. p. 20.

YOU will perceive by a letter sent to his highness from myself and the council here, in what condition our affaires stand, by reason of the sudden death of the late lord chief justice Peepys, being both a member of the councill, and the onely judge in the Upper Bench. He was a good counsellor, and a good judge, and indeed a right honest man. Thus haveing given you a short narative of the matter of fact, I suppose I have done enough, not doubting but you will repaire this breach, as may best stand with reason of state (which you understand better than I doe); and as I need not trouble you with my advice, so indeed I am scarce competent to give it, haveing cause to be more concerned in the contemplation of the estate, in which that good man now is, then of that, in which he hath left us here belowe. I am loath to say any thing as to this subject, it concerning myself, and the rather in regard what I have allreadie sayd, has been so little taken notice of. I'll assure you, I am under soe heavie a dispensation from the hand of the Lord that I am incapable of mindeing any thing. I pray God sanctifie it to mee; and that things may so timely be thought of, as that his highness's affaires may not suffer here, which I pray you may be seriously considered. I am

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Vol. lvi.
P. 319.

SINCE my laste to your honour, we have not had any vessells from Spaine, Italy, or Barbary, which is imputed to the fowle weather wee have lately had, and deprives us of all forraine newes. It hath pleased God to blesse the Portuguez with a greate victory over the Spanish army, that lay before Elvez. That army consisted of 20,000 horse and foote, when they first came into this country; but the terrible raines we had for above two months together, had destroyed a greate part of the Spanish horse, and many of their foote were dead and runn away: so that army was reduced to nyne thousand horse and foote; and the Portuguese having mustered eleven thousand foot and three thousand horse at Estremoz, under the command of the conde de Cantenede, which is six leagues from Elvez; they drew into the field the $\frac{1}{11}$. January: the next day they lodged within a league and a halfe of the enemy. The $\frac{3}{13}$. the Portuguese made a stand all day, waiteing the coming up of some forces, which they expected from Campo Major, which joyned with them that night. The next day, being the $\frac{1}{14}$. instant, the Portuguese fell upon the Spaniards in their trenches about nyne a clock in the morning, where they felt the vallor of the Spaniard; for the first encounter the Portuguese losse aboute 2000 men, and the general of their horse, whose name is Don Andre de Albuquerque. But the Spaniard beeing overpowered, by reason of fower 1000 fresh men, which sallied out of Elvez, the Spaniards gave way; and the Portuguese, followinge them close, killed 4000 foote, and tooke some prisoners of quality. The Spanish horse all fledd, and the night cominge on, the Portuguese forbore prosecutinge their victory any further, intendinge the next day to fall on the reste, if they did not steale away in the night. This newes came to-day by an an exprefs from the generall. To-morrow wee hope to hear the victory is compleate. Moufon in the north of Portugall, which hath been befedged five monthes by the Spaniard, holds out ftill. The Portuguefe have ftill five thoufand men in a body, to fight the Spanifh forces in that place likewife; and if they compleat this victory at Elvez, they will prefently draw away part of that army to the releife of Monfon. The conde de Soyro is elected to goe the ambaffador for France; but whither this good newes will alter the king's refolution in fending him, wee fhall foon know.

Lix. the $\frac{7}{17}$. January, 165 $\frac{8}{9}$.

We are now at the $\frac{10}{20}$. January; the Spaniard is totally routed before Elvez. The general writes the queen, that they killed 5000 in the place, taken near 3000 prifoner; amongft the reft one marques, and the conde de Madalin. The duke de San Jermyn, generall of the Spanifh forces, is fhott in the head, but carried off alive, and fupposed to be now dead; the conde de Tottabilla flayne, the conde de Linhares flayne, the general and lieutenant-general of the horfe, and the major of the ordnance, all flayne; four collobels flayne, and fix taken prifoners; one captain Montayne, an Englifh gentleman, a prifoner, and much wounded. They have taken fifteen feld-peices, eight thoufand mufketts and harquabuffes, nyne pykes, fix hundrd whole arms, abundance of provifion for men and horfe, Don Lewis de Haro's coach and litter, and his cabinet. The particulars will be in print within a day or two, which I will tranflate and fend your honour by captain Wallis of London, that will depart in few days. So committing your honour to the protection of the Almighty, I reft

I knowe I have nowe great advantages of ferving you, and would willing improve them to the utmoft; that being upon fome foundation at the prefent, (which I never was before in any thing, wherein you employ'd me) your lordshipp may receive fuch an accounte of my undertakings, as may prove more to your fatisfaction then heretofore. A letter

A letter from colonel Bamfylde.

A.D. 1658. THAT which I undertake, is to give your lordshipp intelligence of all that passés at the diett at Frankfort, and of all the general proceedings of the emperour, electors of Baviere and Saxony; what forces they have, what they rayse, and whither they designe them; to discover the transactions betwixt the French and their alyes in Germany, as the electors of Ments, Cologne, the Palatine, the landgraves of Hefs and Darmestate, the dukes of Lunenburg, Brunswick and Wirtemberg. Of all I doe undertake to give your lordshipp a constant and exact accounte, with what negotiations there shall bee with electoral colledg about the general peace, which will not be difficult for mee, being well with the elector of Ments and the elector Palatine, whoe are the greatest confidents of France, and most like to knowe, what is intended or pretended by the cardinal touching that affayre. That which I desire is, that I may let the elector Palatine knowe, and the landgrave of Hesse, that I am trusted by you, which will bee for the advantage of your service, as well as for my owne honour and security; since, if I should conceal it, they would suspect it, looke upon mee as a spye in their courts, and treat mee with suspicion, reservedness, and contempt; whereas, on the other side, I doe soe well knowe theyr interests and inclinations, as to be assured they will entertayne mee with all freedome and confidence, when I deal candidly with them. Though I think this best for your service, and my owne particular, yet I shall regulate myselfe exactly according to your lordshipp's better judgment. The better to disguise the cause of my residence in Germany from all els saveing theise 2 princes, I will prevayle with one of them to owne me as an officer of theirs, which I am sure either of them will condescend to.

The next thing I desire, is a letter in Latine from my lord protector to the king of Swede, for his effectual mediation of a reconciliation betwixt the elector and his lady; to move it as a thing conscientious and honorable in itselfe, of great importance to the king of Sweden's proceedings to remove all animositys, which have arisen already, or may further growe upon this occasion between these two princes, to the great damage of the publique business; and if it may be thought fit to use as arguments the merit of the landgrave, the constant zeal, which his ancestors have ever manifested to the Protestant cause and interest, and the amitie which his father and mother have maintain'd with the crowne of Swede, during the laste war in Germany; this will be the highest obligation imaginable to that prince and family, and, in my humble opinion, a great testimony of my lord protector's generosity and piety.

Lastely, I desire a letter from your lordshipp to the elector Palatine, takeing notice, that I have acquainted you with the propositions and demands, which his electoral highness authorised mee to make in his behalfe to the late lord protector. And although you conceive his proposalls to bee of advantage to all the alyes in general, (I mention the alyes, because 'tis expresse'd upon the like occasion in this sense by my lord protector in his highness letter to that prince, the copy whereof I have here) and the later be complied with, as far as may consist with the present state of his highness affayres here; yet I not having produced any credentials to the lord protector, whoe now is, his highness cannot take that notice he is inclin'd to, of what I have propounded, nor knowes what certayne answer to make thereunto, till he shall have some fuller confirmation thereof then my bare assertion, or the credential letter and instructions, which I had to his late highness, which I have not delivered, although your lordshipp has several tymes press'd me thereunto, but have hitherto delay'd it from the expectation of new ones; which not having receiv'd, and resolving upon a speedy returne into Germany, all your lordshipp can at the present say is, that if upon hearing from mee again, his highness continues upon the same grounds, which I have propos'd, and insists upon the same offers and demands, that your lordshipp will acquainte my lord protector therewith; that when the parliament shall bee met, and the imediate and necessary affayres of the nation settled, it may be seasonably recommended to them, whereby his highness may receive satisfaction. If your lordshipp shall allsoe please to take notice of the letter he wrote to yourselfe by his agent above a year since, I suppose it would not bee altogether unnecessary, because he told mee he wrote to you, and had not any answer, seeming a little fencible of it. I only propose theise things to your lordshipp as the matter of such an answer, as I humbly conceive (if you thinke fit to give any) most proper to satisfy and keep him in hopes, whereby you may come to the knowledge of many very material occurrences, without being obleiged to any thing, and be left to doe in the conclusion as you see cause. This will be as much as he can reasonably expect, (I not having expos'd to your view my letter and instructions, which I shall satisfy him well enough for) and will be sufficient to move him to doe (and informe you of) all things, which may be usefull for affayres and knowledge, out of the hopes to effect his business business in the conclusion by that means. I have really very much credit with him, and shall be able to conserve and employ it for the service, if I carry him but a decent answer, and any slender general hopes. I would willingly be gone with all possible expedition, both to be away from hence, where I may be suspected, and to arrive seasonably there, where I can be serviceable, and not well obnoxious to any jealousy.

Mr. Edward Crofton to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland:

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

IN obedience to your excellency's commands, I have been at James-towne on the 13th instant, to see the knights of parliament for the countyes of Sligoe, Roscoman, and Leatrim chosen, where, by an unanimous consent of the freeholders of the said several countyes, one Mr. Robert Park of Newtowne in the countye of Leatrim, and Mr. Thomas Waler a gentleman of Graye's-Inn, (who was especially recommended unto me by my lord of Brohill and Sir John King) have ben voted; but how consistent that may stand with your excellency's pleasure, I am ignorant of: yet being generally voted by the country, I could not in discharge of my duty doe less then accept of them. And in regard of the weighty affaires thereon depending, I durst not trust the transmission of this return into England by any other wayes then by your excellency's packett, which I humbly desire your excellency will be pleased to graunt; for which presumption I most humbly crave your pardon, and remayne

H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland, to secretary Thurloe.

SIR,

I HAVE this day written another to you about Dr. Worth: pray mind it effectually. The terme being very neere, I consulted the councill about supplying the Upper Bench for this pinch, who, upon conference with the judges, have advised mee to give warrant to my lord chancellor to commissionate somebody to keep up that court, by way of adjourning it; which concurring with your advice just now received, shall bee done.

I approve very well of serjeant Archer, and of your care of us in thinkeing of him: pray continue it to gett him over.

I thinke likewise, that Mr. Byffe, recorder of Dublin, will bee very fitt and deserving to be the other judge of that bench; I know him well, and to have 500 l. per annum salary, lesse then which you cannot give the meanest man fitt for the trust and dignity of a judge. I beseech you thank his highnes for remembring mee as to a licence to come into his presence, as soon as the season will permit; though I know not how it will fare with mee between this and that. My indisposition of windines in my side, and oppression at my stomach, (I think with wind too) makes me unable to write otherwise than by this borrowed hand; which I hope yourself and other freinds will excuse upon this occasion; for I am nevertheless,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburne.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

I FEARE some inconvenience will fall out in the proceedings of justice in the Upper Bench in Ireland, for want of a judge to sitt there in the beginnige of the terme. It is a most difficult thinge to get any person of quality to goe from hence for Ireland. There is not a man will be got here fitt for cheife justice, least of all to be of the councell; and therefore it is resolved to secuer those 2 places for the present, and to put in one attorney Basil to be cheife justice, and to seeke out some other person to be of the councell, which will not be done without first knowinge your excellency's judgment, and receiving your approbation.

There was a necessity to send this patent to Mr. Basil, wherein I knowe not wheither we have done well or ill. The sollicitor, I suppose, must be of course in his place.

The parliament now approaches. There is soe great a mixture in the house of commons, that noe man knowes which way the major part will enclyne.

The army seemes to be sensible, that things are not in soe safe a posture as is fitt. It's certeyne the duke of Yorke will put for it in the behalfe of his brother at this tyme; and that this is the very season: and truly, if our division be as some thinke, they make noe ill judgment; but I hope they will be disappointed. Our two old freinds have of late professed great fidelity to his highnes, and that they will live and dye with him in the maintenance of the government. I hope noe body is otherwise minded. However, I beleieve most men will be tryed sufficiently. I doe not heare, that Sir Henry Vane or major Salway are chosen: all the rest of our old freinds to a man are chosen. The affaires of the East doe remeyne much in one posture; if there be any alteration, it is, that the Swede seemes to declyne, all Prussia beinge in danger to be taken from hym; and the only place he hath in Jutland, viz. Frederickstode, is besiedged by the confederate army of Brandenburg, Pole, and emperour. It is sayd, that the kinge of Sweden is in person there, and hopes to raise the seige; but there is little probability of it. The Dutch are alsoe arminge against hym, and will have a very great fleet ready by the springe. This occasions his highnes to sett forth alsoe a very great fleet, that wee may be some ballance to these states, and to defend our owne comonwealth. Our necessities of money will be encreased by this, and the parliament can only help us. I have had nothinge from your excellency by the post these many weekes. I rest

DEARE BROTHER,

A.D. 1658.

I HAVE little to wright, but that I would not have a post paste with silence from my selfe, though I have little to trouble you with, but to make my acknowledgment for your regard to thos persons, who have bine formerly commissionated by my selfe, when I left Ireland, that they are not outed by the late sadde occasion of vacating their pattents. I hope they generally may be deserving persons, that may please to remember. We did take the best care we could to put in such persons as might be deserving, and in some measure qualiyed for their places, though I feare they have as yet received little benefit; but should they now be removed, it would be their ruin, and therefore your justice and favor also is the more seasonable. I have had a desire to improve a litle monyes for poore Cromwell, whearin I understand by Sir Jerome Zancky, you have bine pleased to have a favorable regard unto such an intention; and the more I thank you, that you have expressed your dislik of taking that course, which it seemes was by som intended, that would have proved a very disreputable thing to me, and what I could not satisfy my selfe in; neither shall I willingly ingage in any thinge, but what may receive your approbation in. You in part know my estate and condition. I canot make an advantage of my publicke imployments, as many have, or others suppose I doe; neither am I sollicitous about this busnes. I have sufficient cause from experience to trust the Lord with children, whom I shall leave behind me. His blessing with a litle is great riches. Excuse this trouble to you. We are now preparing for the parliament. The state of our condition will, I hope, be so represented and stated to them, as to give at least this satisfaction, that our demands are both for the honor and safety of the nation. The Lord awaken thos, who have an interest in him, to be earnest with him, for his owning this blessed cause, which hath so many enemyes at home and abroad; which that we may finde, is the desire of

SIR,

HAVING this opportunity offered by Dr. Sclater, who desires to waite upon you, upon your kind invitation, which I acquainted him with, I could do no lesse, then, accompanying him with these few lines, to present my service to you. I am perswaded you will be well satisfied in his ingenuity, when you are acquainted with him. Now I have this opportunity, I shall use the freedome to acquaint you with another busines. I am perswaded by freinds to publish some discourses, which I have prepared in Latine, that will be of a polemical nature, in defence of Christianity against Judaisme, explaining some cheef places of Scripture controverted between the Jewes and us, (as Daniel's prophecy of 70 weekes, never yet sufficiently cleared and improved) and withall extricating many difficulties of chronologie; which taske I the rather undertooke, not onely because it is futable to my Hebrew profession, and because I have lighred on some such Jewish writings upon that argument, as have scarcely ever been seen by any Christians, which would the better inable me fully to confute them, but allso, because I conceive it a worke proper and suitable to this present age. However, though I should not be able my selfe to be any way instrumentall to those great transactions of providence (not without cause hoped for of many) amongst the Jewes; yet, I perswade my selfe, my paines may not be altogether unprofitable, for the settling and establishing of Christians; or at least, I shall give account of my spending such vacant houres, as I could redeeme from my preaching and other occasions, and the perpetuall distractions of the bursarship, which the statutes of this colledge impose upon me. It was my purpose to dedicate these fruits of my studys to his highnes, (to whose noble father I was much obliged) if I may have leave, or presume so to doe, which I cannot better understand by any then your selfe, if you shall thinke it convenient, when you have an opportunity to insinuate any such thing, which I permitte wholly to your prudence. I intend, God willing, to be in London some time in March, and then I shall waite upon you, to receive your information. In the meane time craving pardon for this prolixity of mine, and freedome, I subscribe my selfe

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

I HAVE already write your honour by three severall convayances of the greate defeate given the Spaniards by the Portuguezes before Elvez, (viz.) by the George of Bristoll, and the William M. Garrett, and the Mary Mr. Jones of London; but I sente your honour the perticulars of the prisoners, and how many were slaine, but by the taste; so I shall make bold to trouble your honour with the repetition, as I had them from the secretary of state.

A list of the men slaine in the battell before Elvez, the 4. January, 1659. with a relation of the artillary, armes, and other necessarys, found in the enemies camp.

The duke de St. Germans, shot in the head with a carbyne, and supposed to be dead.

The conde de Tottamilla.

The camp-master generall.

Don Gaspar de Luna.

Don Ventura Taracona, master of the ordynance.

Don Juan Pechequo, lieutenant-general of the horse.

The captain of the general's guard, whoe was sonne to the conde de Motifo.

The conde de Linhares.

Don Francisco Fernandes, besides abundance of captains of horse and foote, and other officers, and many knights of the habit; and above three thousand common soldiers all slaine in the place.

Taken from the enemy.

Betwixt five and six hundred horse.

A great quantity of mony and wrought plate.

Many rich hangings, and severall trunks of other rich furniture.

A greate quantity of torches and wax candells.

Bisquit for the whole army, and provender for all the horse for a fortnight.

Seaventeen peice of ordynance.

Five mortar-pieces.

A great quantity of musket and carbyne bullets.

Sixteen hundred shott for the ordinance.

Six hundred barrils of powder.

Fifteen hundred ronds of match.

Five hundred armes for backe and breste.

Eight thousand hoes, pit-axes, and shovells.

Six thousand crowns worth of planke, and deale boards.

Twenty thousand eight hundred granadas.

Eighty ladders.

A good quantity of pitch and other necessarys for fire-works.

Many tents.

Five coaches and two litters, besides abundance of riches plundered by the soldiers; but all the particulars before-mentioned were taken for the use of his majestie. Since the battell, the Portngueze tooke five hundred prisoners, which were stript of all thire clothes, and sent naked into Spaine.

Prisoners of quallity, now in the possession of the Portugueze,

The conde de Madalin.

Don Alonso de Byamonte,

Don

Don Antonio de los Infantes.

Don Rodrigo Arispues, with many other officers and knights of the habitt.

May it please your Honour,

WE are now at the $\frac{2}{3}$ January. Yesterday I received a letter from Cadix the 7th January, 1659. which signifys, that aboute the latter end of December, there arived an avifo from the West-Indies, which is a ship belonging to Rotterdam. This vessell brings intelligence, that the Spanish fleet, consistinge of aboute sixty saile, were all at the Havannah at his departure, and they would be ready to saile for Spaine aboute the middle of November at farthest. They will bringe in all above sixty millions of treasure, and with the reste six millions, which the gentry and merchants inhabitinge the West-India sende the kinge of Spaine for a gratuity, towards the maintenance of his warrs. The five Dutch ships, which the duke of Medina Cely had taken up at Cadix, are gonn to sea. They are to lye betwixt the Canaries and the bay of Cadix, to give intelligence to the fleete, that in case the Inglish fleete be on the coaste, to order them for Galitia and Biskay; but if the coaste be cleare, they have order to come for Cadix. We doubt not of our success against Portugall, for Elvez cannot hold out longe; so that will be ours in few days: and then beeinge masters of the field, our forces will march to Lisbon next summer; before which place we expect forty sail of Hollanders, and with our friends wee expecte to finde in Portugall, wee hope to see a full conquest. Don Juan de Austria is landed at St. Andera, whoe is to be generall of the forces imployed in Portugall. Which is all I can learne at present, &c.

The Portugueze are extremly jealous, that his highnesse will conclude a peace with Spaine. Here is a rumour in the courte, that the Spaniard hath proffered the Braziel to the Inglish, to make his highnesse the more willinge to shut up the peace. I cannot learn, from whence this comes; but it hath beene reported by some of the beste at courte. Wee can gett noe justice at all from them, for they make no scruple at all to breake all the articles of peace; and if his highnes be not pleased to look on us, and make the kinge of Portugall sensible of the wrongs donne our nation by his ministers, our burthens will be intolerable. But we hope your honour will be pleased to take care, that wee shall enjoy the benefitt of the treaty of peace; and wee will always pray, that the Lord will bleffe your honour. Which are the constant prayers of

Your Honour's faithfull servant,

THO. MAYNARD.

Lord Broghill to Secretary Thurloe.

DEARE SIR,

WHEN you honor me with your commands, I thinke nothinge can be a proportionate returne to them, either in reference to themselves, or the duty I owe them, but a perfect obedience to them. This is the cause, why till now I would not trouble you with an answer to your commands, about Mr. Waller and Mr. Green's election, which came soe late to my hands, that all places were ingaged for persons before; soe that all I could doe, was, to ingage a cousin-german of myne, and I may say, as considerable a person for parts and interest, as any in this nation, to get of a friend of his, that had declared to stand, and to get Mr. Waller chosen in his stead; which is done. My friend and kinsman's name is Sir Ihin Kinge. I did for Mr. Greene write a letter into Scotland, which, if it come time enough, I hope has had the like success. I am certeyn, had your orders come time enough, they had bine both obeyed with as much reddeiness, as ever I did pay to my actions of greatest affection and duty.

I did last night com from chooseinge our knight of the shyre in the county of Corke, and our burgeses for that city and the towne of Youghall. There were greate endeavors to have had som chosen, that I was not very sure of; but their designe was defeated, and thos two I propounded, without six negatives, chosen. Our knight is my owne cosen german, Sir Maurice Fenton, a gentleman of 2000 l. a yeere; and our burgeses lieutenant-col. Foulkes, a gentleman of 800 l. a yeere, always bred with me; and for both thes I ingage. 'Tis not improbable but we shall all speedely waite on you; at lest all my friends shall, and if possible, myselfe; who am, in all immaginable reallity,

DEARE SIR,

Your truly affectionate, and most faithful

oblidged humble servant,

DEARE SIR,

I HAD not the honnor to receive yours of the 30^h of last month, till yester night late; and therefore, if I pay you my humble thanks for it noe sooner, be pleased to attribute it to the true cause. I had indeed waited on you, before I had received his highnes's commands for it, but that heere was som notable juggelings in elections; and that necessitated me to stay, that I might be present at them, to prevent such designes, which, I thanke God, I did; and this county, which is the magazeene of English in this nation, has sent you thos, that, I dare say, if admitted to a tryall, will shew themselves honnest men, both to their county, and to his highnes's service in particular. Thes designers had soe unexpected and closely carryed on their worke, that till two dayse before the election none was aware of them. But then, in the face of the whole cuntry, and to their owne faces too, (for I sent to them to be ther, and told them for what) I made them appeere such as they were, and they had not one voice. Our election-day heere was the last thursday, and we are all, by the blessing of God, redy to take the first faire winde, tho' the late stormes might (if any thing could retarde us) perswade us to see a little settelment of weather, ere we set to sea. I know not wher the omission is, but certaynly 'twas verry unhappily contrived, that our election-day should be soe late in thes parts, that it was impossible to be at the first sittinge of the parliament. I heere presume to trouble you with my answer to his highnes's letter, which I beg you to seale and deliver. I will not lengthen this letter, hopeinge suddenly to have the honour to waite on you; but conclude it with this great and unchangeable truth, that I am heartily,

DEARE SIR,

Your truly affectionate and most faithfull

oblidged humble servant,

Jan. 24. 1658.

BROGHILL.

I hope you have ere now received an account of what comes to about Mr. Waller's beinge elected knight of shyre in Ireland; as Mr. Greehe had bin, if your letters had come to me timely enough. His comminge so late, I was necessitated to recommend his election into Scotland, wher I am confident he has succeeded, if my letter come redy enogh.

I RECEIVED your lordship's, and am glad the papers concerning our arreares is come to your hands: truly our arreares are very great. You have very much obliged myself, and the whole army, by the care you have taken of sending us some monies; butt I could wish I could heare it were once on shippe-board. I am sorry to heare, that Thoren is delivered uppe; but I doe nott doubt of the Swedish good successe, soe longe as their army is nott beaten. The indentures for the commissioners of parliament from the Northerne parts heere come in very slowly, which I am heartilly sorry for. For newes heere, we have none. I have nott yett heard of any more of the commissioners in the North, since I wrote to you last. I thanke you for your care about the goaler of Durham. Itt hath given a great refreshment to all the good people thereabout. You would not think how kindlie it is taken. Mr. recorder Shaftoe and captain Thomas Lilburne are chosen burgeffes for Newcastle. Which is all at present from

Sir Charles Coote to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCYE,

I JUST now received the inclosed letter from lieutenant Pountroye, which contains ^{A.D. 1658.} such matter, as I thought it my duty to transmitt the same unto your lordship, and humbly to submitt the same unto your consideration. I dare not presume to offerr much thereon; but truly if such speritts as his be not curbed, it may begett ill consequences: and the influence that Ormesby hath in it, who hath bine the sole occasion of the troubles, that have bine here; I am humbly of opinion, that it is worthy of your lordship's good consideration, whether colonell Sadlier should goe for England, unless some more active person were here in his absence, then captain More, who is but a sickly man, and one that hath little or noe interest in the regiment.

I resolve on wensday, if God please, to begine my jurnye towards Dublin; and hope before that day fenight to kifs your lordship's hands. Which is all I shall presume to trouble your lordship with at the present, and remayne,

MY LORD,

Mr. J. Woodward to secretary Thurloe.

MY LORD,

YOUR lordship's of the 25th instant I have received, and in answere thereunto doe hereby give you assurance, that by reason of your lordship's recommendation Mr. Samuell Morland will be chosen at Ludgarshall; and of this I desire your lordship not at all to doubt. I beseech your lordship, that you will be pleased to command the high sheriffe to send his precepte for the election to me, which in the election of Mr. Dewy and Mr. Sherwyn he would not lett me have, but came in person to our burrough, and in the tyme of our election publickly and causelessly forbade to assist in our owne election. Mr. Dewy can informe you of all his carriage. That the Lord may blesse the gentleman you recommend, and inable him for that waighty worke; and that the Lord may blesse you all, and make your meetinge successfull, to the glory of his name, and the weal publique, is the hearty desire of,

MY LORD,

Mr. Tho. Browne to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONORABLE SIR,

Marselia, the 28th of Jan. 1658. English stile.

TWO dayes after I received my commission to bee consul at Tunis, I left England, and made what haste I could through France to meete with admiral Stoakes, unto whose care your honour was pleased to recommend my transportation thither.

The twenty-fourth instant your honour's favourable letter was delivered to me at the Iles of Eres: but as formerly hee refused to send a ship with mee for want of an order, soe now hee pretends, that the affaires of his highnesse will not (as yet) give him leave to parte with any of his squadron. As for other conveyances, here are none but French barques, which are neither capable of landing a publicke minister with honour, nor yet of defending themselves at sea against their enemyes; and the Turkes of Argeire making slaves of all English passengers, which they find in foraine vessels, I dare not adventure myselfe with these. Being thus accidentally (if not maliciously) disapointed of my passage, I shall, according to the power my commission gives mee, substitute a deputy at Tunis, who may (during my absence) conserve the peace with those people, and protect our merchants and others trading and residing in those partes; which is all that can be done (at this distance) in reference to those affaires. And when our admirall returns from

A.D. 1658. his intended voyadge to the Streights mouth, I hope hee will (according to his promise) see order his affaires, that I may have a frigott to transporte mee with credit and safety into my station. Meane while, having done my duty in giving your honour an account of what passeth, I rest most humble and very much oblig'd servant,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Vol. lxiii.
p. 65.

AS it is our university's honour, that we have so noble a patron, so may you please to make it our college's happiness, that it may reap some of the first-fruits of that your condescending relation to us. Sir, at our next election of fellows, we have divers young men to stand for places, who are of eminent worth; and we should esteem it a great damage to our college, if they should be hindered. But from sure hands we have it, that one Mr. Barthol. Woormall of Lynn, who had some time a son of our college, and continued here till he was batchelor of arts, and during that time was not much approvable either for abilities, or diligence, or studious carriage, whom he intends to endeavour by a mandate from his highness to bring in to be a fellow amongst us; who yet may be provided of a ministerial employment at Hampton, which he seemeth unwilling to accept; our most humble desire therefore is, that your honour would vouchsafe us this favour, by your mediation with his highness, timely to prevent his being put in amongst us that way, to the discouraging such candidates here with us, who may be of much better deserts; and because the father of this young man saith, that a change is wrought in his son's heart and conversation, that he may be left to the usual examen, which such as stand for such places here undergo, and to our statutable election; and if he shall approve himself as well as others, the way will be open to him, as soon as any other. Pardon, we humbly beseech your honour, this our bold address in a matter, which so much concerneth the welfare of the college, which we are betruſted with. And your favour and help herein shall ever oblige us in all humble thankfulness to remain

A letter of intelligence.

Hague, 29. January, [1658.]

Vol. lxiii.
p. 38.

MR. Downing, at a late audience, recommended to the states general the accommodating of differences betwixt the two Protestant kings; but it is far from their intentions here to seek that agreement apart, but they will join with it that of Poland and Austria, and so procure a general peace. And it is here resolved, if the same cannot be effected by fair means, that is to say, by the mediation of the states general, they will vigorously assist the king of Denmark with men, money, and ships; upon which account the states have again advanced in antecessum four hundred thousand guilders, which Rosenwing is now to receive at Amsterdam. The states general have, upon persuasion of the states of Holland, taken a settled resolution, (which they seem to lay as a position) how and upon what conditions peace shall be made both betwixt Sweden and Denmark, and Sweden and Poland;

Poland; namely, that each party should restore to the other what they have taken from them A.D. 1658.
 during this war. They shall reduce all things in their former condition, and so lay down arms; and then all grievances betwixt both parties shall be decided and accommodated by both parties allies, which they say Mr. Downing pretends to be according to the lord protector's meaning; but I believe it not, that Mr. Downing reporteth it, because in his proposition the accommodation of Poland was not thought on, but only of both the Protestant kings; and I cannot see, that it is England's interest to speak of an accomodation with Poland, and consequently Austria, because they are not to be separated. It is an easy matter to make a peace sudden betwixt Sweden and Denmark, if they would be earnest in it here.

An ACT of recognition of his highness's right and title to be protector and chief magistrate of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

WHEREAS your highness, immediately after the death of your renowned father Vol. lxxiii. p. 67.
 Oliver, late lord protector of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, became his lawfull successor to succeed in the government of the said nations, to the great joy of the people thereof, testified not only by their general consent and approbation, but many particular declarations and addressees from the armies, and navies, and the respective counties, cities and burroughs of the three nations; and your highness hath accordingly taken upon you the said succession and government, which God in his great mercy to these nations hath hitherto blessed with peace and tranquillity: And although this is ample satisfaction of the people's hearty acknowledgment of your highness's succession in the government: We the two houses in parliament assembled do beseech your highness, that as a testimony to posterity of our unfeigned love and affection to your highness's person, and our hearty recognition and agreement of your highness's just right to succeed in the government, this may remain among the records of the high court of parliament for ever. And for the better establishment of the peace of this commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the territories and dominions thereunto belonging, and for the prevention of the designs and attempts of the enemies thereof; this present parliament assembled do, in the name of all the people of this commonwealth, fully, freely, absolutely, and for ever, disclaim and renounce all fealty, homage, or allegiance, pretended to be due unto Charles Stuart, eldest son of the late king Charles, James Stuart second son of the said late king, Henry Stuart third son of the said late king, or any other the issue or posterity of the said late king, or any person or persons pretending, or which shall at any time hereafter pretend title, by, from, or under him, them, any or either of them, to hold and enjoy the crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or of either or any of them; or to have the name, title, style, or dignity of king or queen of Great-Britain, king or queen of England, Scotland, and Ireland, prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, prince of Scotland, duke of Albany, duke of Rothesay, duke of York, duke of Gloucester, any or either of them; or to have and enjoy the power, government, or supreme magistracy of this commonwealth, or of any part thereof, or of any the territories or dominions there-unto belonging; or to have or enjoy, as king or queen of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or of either or any of them, prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, duke of Albany, duke of Rothesay, duke of York, duke of Gloucester, or prince of Scotland, all or any the honours, manors, lands, tenements, possessions, and hereditaments heretofore belonging or appertaining to the said crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or to any or either of them; or to the principality of Wales, duchy of Lancaste or Cornwall, or any or either of them.

And be it declared and enacted by his highness the lord protector, and this present parliament assembled, and the authority thereof, that the said Charles Stuart, James Stuart, Henry Stuart, and all other the issue and posterity of the said late king, and all and every person and persons pretending, or which shall or may at any time hereafter pretend title or claim, from, by, or under him or them, be and are, and shall for ever be absolutely and utterly excluded and debarred from holding or enjoying the crown of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or any or either of them, or any the dominions or territories thereto belonging; and from holding or having the name, title, style, or dignity of king or queen of Great-Britain, king or queen of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or any or either of them, or of any the dominions thereunto belonging, prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, prince of Scotland, duke of Albany, duke of Rothesay, duke of York, or duke of Gloucester; and from all title, claim, or right as king

A.D. 1658. king or queen of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or of either or of any of them, prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, duke of Albany, duke of Rothesay, duke of York, duke of Gloucester, or prince of Scotland, unto all or any the honours, manors, lands, tenements, possessions or hereditaments heretofore at any time belonging or appertaining to the said crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or any or either of them; and also from having, exercising, or enjoying any power, authority, government, or magistracy, in or over this commonwealth, or any the people thereof; and that all such right, title, claim, or pretence of right, title, or claim, which they or any of them, at any time heretofore, at present, or in time to come, have, do, shall, or may make, is hereby declared and adjudged, and shall for ever hereafter be adjudged and taken, to be utterly void and of no effect.

And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, and it is enacted, that if any person or persons shall endeavour or attempt, by force of arms or otherwise, or shall be aiding, assisting, comforting, or abetting unto any person or persons, that shall by any ways or means whatsoever endeavour, or attempt, the reviving or setting up of any pretended right, title, or claim of the said Charles Stuart, James Stuart, Henry Stuart, or of any other the issue or posterity of the said late king, or of any person or persons claiming under him or them, to any the offices, style, dignity, or authority aforesaid, or any of them; or shall declare, publish, or any way promote such pretended right, title, or claim, or shall give or contribute any sum or sums of money, or other aid or assistance, to the said Charles Stuart, James, and Henry, any or either of them: that then every such offence shall be, and is hereby deemed and adjudged high treason; and all and every the offender and offenders therein, their counsellors, aiders, and abettors, being convicted within three years after such offence committed, shall be deemed and adjudged traitors, and shall suffer and have such pains of death, and forfeitures, as in case of high treason is used and ordained.

General Fleetwood to Henry Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

DEARE BROTHER,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburne.

I HAVE little time left this post, but to let you know things goe on here hopefully, though the parliament hath done little more then settling their own priviledges. Only this day was offer'd a bill of recognition of his highness, which is order'd to be read next munday the 2d time: a bill of the same natur hath been read twice with us. The great contest lik to be is about our howse. What the issue of that will be, we shall suddenly know. It is generally amongst us owned, that the Petition and Advise will be that we shall make our standard; and what formerly was a bone of contention, will be wholly layd aside.

Things at present are beyond expectation. The Lord above hath the hearts of all men in his hand: he changes and turns mens minds as most answer his designs, though men least take notice thereof. How shoud it be our buyfness alone to make that our intrest, which answers his designs? It is not a thing (if I may say it) to be disputed, whither the intrest of the Lord's people should be uppermost or not; for he by a series of providence hath made it so; and now whosoever goes to turn it into another channel, will be found in opposition to the work of the Lord. It will appeare, that the best preservative of our civill liberties is to maintaine and keepe up our religious libertyes, and that by good men; to which who had a greater witnes from the Lord born to him then his late deare highnes? Which that it may still have as deep sence upon us, is the desire of

Your most affectionate brother, and humble servant.

Feb. 1. [1658.]

My cosen Scudmor, collonel Cooke, intreat your favour for his continuance in his place, which he hade under my lord Pepys. I am to intreat you to continue my old servant Erasmus Saunders in the place of the ferrys of Dublin.

Dr. Tho. Clarges to Henry Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELENCY,

A.D. 1658.

THE parliament have now sate almost a week, and I hope it will be the happiest parliament, that ever sate in England. This day Mr. secretary Thurloe brought in an act for the recognition and establishment of his highnes and the government; which after very little debate was read the first time, and order'd to be read againe on monday next. Some few made sharp reflections upon the bill, but the spirit of the house was so much for it, that by this day's action, I perceive, things will go fairly on. The Scotch and Irish members have bin a little glanc'd at; but I think there will be no more said of that business; and I believe, by the next I may send your excellency an account of a bill read in the house, to confirme their number and distributions. It was this day tender'd, but so late, that the reading is put off till to-morrow. On monday next there will be a tuffe debate upon the second reading of the recognition; but there is no danger. I dare not particularize persons to your excellency; but when you know Sir Arthur Hazleing; lord Lambert, Mr. Scot, lieutenant-generall Ludlow, and captaine Baines, are of the parliament, I shall not need to enumerate the rest, I am,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburne.

May it please your EXCELENCY,

London, this 1st of February, 1658.

Your excellency's most humble servant,

THO. CLARGES.

Mr. John Cooke, to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

Right hon. and my very good LORD,

YOU may well wonder, that my obligations for your lordship's favours being so many, my returnes of acknowledgment should be so few. I have forborne the frequencie of writing, as intending all the last year to have returned, had not my wife's consumptive condition and the death of my aged father retarded; but I can truly say, that I have daily remembred your lordship in my poor prayers, because I doe truly love and honor you; that Ireland may be every way happy under your lordship's government. It is a place, which I love best of any upon earth, God having cast my lot there, wherein your lordship's love to me in procuring my proviso, in the act of satisfaction, is never to be forgotten. I have presented my dutifull thanks to his highness for the commission, which he hath sent me, to be secundary judge of his highnes court of King's Bench, which I doe most humbly imbrace; and am returning speedily by your lordship's favor to set upon it. I am very much obliged to his highnes, and (God willing) I shall doe him and your lordship true and faithfull service, to the best of my small skill and understanding. His highnes hath promised me to write to your lordship, that if your lordship please, I may reteane my salary for the last year; but I shall in all things submit to your lordship's wisdom, and rest in your goodnes, whether my poor weake wife be able to travaile or not. If God spare my life, I shall attend your lordship before Easter term, and shall ever remaine

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburne.

London, Feb. the 1. 58.

Your LORDSHIP's humbly devoted,

JOHN COOKE.

Colonel Barkstead, lieutenant of the Tower, to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

I EVEN now have received a plures wrytt for Halsall to appeare thursday next. I had intimation from Mr. Scobell, that the last night, or this morning, I should receive further warrants; but as yet I heare not of any, whereby I might prepare myselfe for a due returne. I desire Mr. attorney may have notice, that I am to bring Halsall to the barr on thursday morning, that he may performe what concernes him there. I have also a wryt for Mr. Robert Harley's appearance the same tyme. I desire a word of advise, what I shall doe as to him; for I heare, that he is resolved immediately to petition the parliament, in case his first writt is not returned. Sir Humfry Bennet, and the rest, that have had wrytts,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

THE last night, as alsoe this morning, I acquainted you, that James Halsall and John Sturgion had brought their writts of plures, &c. and that I expected suddenly Sir Humfrey Benett's, Paulden's, and Bin's; and alsoe in my last, that major Robert Harley had taken forth his habeas corpus, returnable alsoe to-morrow morning, (as the plures are) whereupon he might ground his petition to the parliament, if denyed in this way; and I heare nothing of answeare therein from your honour or the counsell. I shall be necessitated to make my returne to-morrow morning with the warrants I now have. I am already under the fines of some hundreds of pounds: besides, I understand, that if the prisoners should escape, I am lyable to the debts their creditors pretend to charge them with, or if otherwise discharged without the creditors consent, besides the perpetual clamours I lye under, and censure of their relations, and others not concerned.

Sir, I hope your honour will take this busynesse and me therein into serious consideration, which is hereby humbly desired; but should have been personally intreated, if my health would permitt. That strength I have, I imploy at the parliament; and therefore I hope I shall now be the more easily excused. Not more, but that I am,

General Monck to secretary Thurloe.

MY LORD,

THIS gentleman att his coming from London, bringing a letter from you to mee, I A.D. 1658. could doe noe lesse, then returne a letter by him againe to your lordship. I finde him and the rest of that party very peaceable men, and truly every day more complying then other; and I doubt not butt in time they will bee ready to joyne with us. Mr. Sharpe has for his owne parte always used his utmost indeavours to bringe itt to passe, and I hope his end will nott be in vaine. For newes wee have none. All thinges are quiett and well heere; soe, desiring the Almighty God to blesse you in those weighty affaires you have in hand, I take leave, and remaine Dalkeith, 4th Febr. 1658.

Your LORDSHIP'S

very affectionate humble servant,

GEORGE MONCK.

Consul Maynard to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

WE are now at the $\frac{4}{14}$. February. Since the writinge the foregoeing there is arrived Mr. Andrew Bond, commander of the ship Anne and Joyce of London, from the Brazill: he mett captain Coppinge, in the Langfort, with three other frigotts in sight of the island of St. Michael. I doubt they will not meete any of the advisors sente out from Cadiz, for they range more to the southwards nere the Canaries; and in case any of them be gonn to the westward, they will be about the Flowers and Cornas, rather than nere St. Michael's.

Last weeke arrived at Faro three French shipes from the bay of Cadiz. By them I had a letter, which gives notice, there are two Hollanders more arrived, one from the Havanah, and another from the Honduras. The plate-fleete is expected infallibly every hower. These Frenchmen landed greate store of things at Cadiz, and St. Lucar, and they are now retired to Faro, where they intend to stay, untill they have intelligence of the fleet's aryval to retourne to the bay of Cadiz againe, to fetch of the proceads of thire goods they landed.

Here is noe alteration in the Portugal affaires since the rysinge the seidge at Elvez. Mouson is still closely begirt; and these people goe on slowly in relievinge that place, as if they were fearefull their succour would come too soone. Wee can gett noe justice at all: the king's ministers make no scruple of breakinge the articles of peace; and if his highnesse be not pleased to looke on our sufferings, and make the kinge of Portugall sensible of the wrongs wee daily receive from his ministers, our burthens will grow intollerable. I committe your honour to the protection of the Almighty, and rest, &c.

[$\frac{4}{14}$. Febr. 1659.]Mr. James Wood, &c. to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

IT hath been no small proof of God's kindness toward us, that by your lordship's appearing so actively for us, and the cause of God in our hands, in opposition to these, who have made it their work to raise themselves upon the ruins of this church, we have been hitherto kept from utter desolation. As the account of this your tender care was very refreshful, when we heard all the passages thereof from our R. brother, Mr. Sharp, at his return to us from London; so the sense thereof hath been often renewed by the informations we have had from time to time of your continual remembrance of us, and of your vigilant care, that nothing be done to the prejudice of this poor church, and the established government thereof. And though we do rest confident, that though none of us did appear, your lordship would be careful to let nothing pass to our prejudice; yet considering, that at this time some are gone up, of whose bad intentions we have formerly had several proofs, we judged it convenient to send up our brother again for a short view of the former account, that he may be needy by the assistance of your lordship and others, whom the Lord hath inclined to tender our condition, to prevent any prejudice they may intend against the government of this church. Our brother will fully acquaint your lordship with our condition and deportment; and your former favour doth now embolden us humbly to supplicate

A.D. 1658. cate for the continuance of it; and that ye may be pleased to be assistant to him in what shall be thought necessary for preventing any projects, which may be started to our disadvantage, though we can never be able to make any requital for all this your lordship's trouble; yet it shall be our desire, that the Lord Christ may richly recompense all this your labour of love with his best blessings. To his grace we recommend your lordship, and are,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Vol. lvii. p. 294. YESTERDAY came an expresse to the queen, which gave her the badd news of the surrender of Mouson to the Spaniards. The Portugez governor marcht out with one piece of ordinance, and the soldiers with thire armes. There were but 240 men leste in the place, when it was surrendered; and they had not any provision nor amunition leste in the towne. Three thousand men would have relieved that garrison, and after the sedge of Elvez was risen, they might have spared fouer tymes that number. It pleased God to give to the kinge good successe at Elvez, farr beyond the expectation of many that governe; and if the king doe not open his eyes, he will be ere longe without a kingdome. Had the Spaniard rallied with two thousand men, and marcht to Elvez, he had taken the place; for three dayes after the seidge was rissen, there were not two hundred men leste in the towne: all the cittezens dyed of a contagious disease in the tyme of the seidge, and to this day there is no care taken to putt in a garrison to that place.

I have lately written your honour by severall conveyances, that there are two Holland shipes arived at Cadiz, one from the Havanah, the other from Honduras. The plate-fleete is infallibly expected every houer at Cadiz. Captain Coppinge with his squadron lyes to furr to the westeward to meete the five shipes that were sent out of Cadiz to give advise to the fleete; for he is nere the islands of the Azores, and the Holland shipes sente out by the duke of Medina Celi range betwixt the Canaries and the bay of Cadiz. I Thought to have sente away the foregoeing three or four days since; but the ship not beeing so ready as I imagined, shee will now carry your honour the newse of the surrender of Mouson to the Spaniard. Yesterday came an expresse to the queen with the articles. The Portugez governor marcht out with one piece of ordinance, and all the soldiers with their armes. There were but 240 men livinge in the place, when it was surrendered; and they had not any provision nor amunition leste in the towne. Three thousand men would have relieved that garrison, and after the sledge of Elvez was risen, they might have sente fouer times that number. It pleased God to give the kinge good successe at Elvez far beyond the expectation of many that governe; and if the king doe not open his eyes, he will be ere long without a kingdome. Had the Spaniard rallied with 2000 men, and marched to Elvez, he had taken the place; for three days after the sledge was rissen, there were not 200 men in the city: the citizens all dyed of a contagious distemper in the tyme of the sledge, and to this day there is noe care at all taken to put in a garrison to that place. DEARE BROTHER,

I SHALL not trouble you more then to make a cover for this inclosed, presuming you have so good an account of all passages heare, that you will not neade the trouble of my pen. We are in a very uncertain condition, what the issue of things will be. The debate about the recognition holds in the commons house, and supposed will not so soone be determined as wer desirable. We are very silent in our howse, and litle probability, that we shall be owned. What the issue of all things will be, no man can determine; but the Lord's design shall prosper, and thos, who keepe closest to that, will be sure to prosper best, or at least have comfort in whatsoever shall be the consequence of things.
 Indeed our affayres for want of moneyes ar in a sadde condition at home and abroad.
 Allso the season of the yeare coming on fast, and great preparations are making, which (if the Lord prevents not) we shall feele the smart of. The Sweede are much put to it, but have of late a good additionall forse come to him to strengthen the leagure. It is a buyfnes of great consequence unto our affayres, if it should com into the hand of the Dutch, who are designing and hastning their preparations thereunto. If the Lord keeps us from divisions, we shall have yet cause of hopes of mercy; which that we may walke more worthy of, is the desire of

Dr. Thomas Clarges to Henry Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

I AM not yet able, by the best observation I can make, to tell your lordship how things will goe in this parliament. Wee have many severall men of excelent parts, and severall judgments both in politicks and religion; but those, that are for a nationall church, seeme to be the greatest number. The act of recognition of his highnes right and title, &c. was yesterday read a second time, and that day and this it has bin debated without any resolution, and to-morrow morning the debate is to be resumed, and nothing to intervene. I perceive a great (I think I may say, the greatest) sense of the house is with it; but those, that oppose, are able speakers, which makes the considerations long before they come to a question. I doe not observe any, that can object any thing against his highnes person; those that have bin sharpe, and have seemed to doubt of his due nomination to the succession, but yet concluded to approve it; others have glaunced at the establishing a commonwealth to consist of a single person, a senate, and the people; but nothing of this kind has bin gratefully received. There is such caution often given of not communicateing the debates of the house, that I am not so perticular to your excellency as otherwise I should be; and I am the lesse, because I suppose you may have them from better hands. This day I saw
 Mr. Barrer, captaine Kissen, and some others, in the lobby, with a petition; but it was

A.D. 5816, not offered: I suppose it is something not very agreeable to the present government. Your excellency knows these are no new arts. I shall from time to time informe your excellency of what I know in that or any other matter, and am,

I WROTE to his highness a letter of Jan. 22. which I hope he received. I know your busines is great and urgent, and will be tender of troubling you: only I thought fit to advertise you, that I was talking with the clarke of the peace the other day, who was speaking of some unmeet additions to the commissioners of peace (as I apprehended); and I thinke, that it were better to let them stand as they are at present, especially there being no assizes, there need no renewing the commission. All that I adde is, that I perceive the parties disaffected to settlement are adroit in making petitions to the strengthening their designe. If you find, that such things take any impressiion, they may easily be ballanced with contrary opinions. And I shall write to Mr. Poole, or some others about London, not to sit idle, and suffer themselves to be prejudiced by the activity of their adversaries, but to keepe pace with them in all honest endeavors for preventing changes and disturbances. I do something suspect, that unruly spirit will have a vent, and therefore it were good to prepare for it. But I will forbear your trouble, especially having an ague to excuse me. I remaine

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

I HAVE by several conveyances signified to your honour all the occurrences of these partes. What I write concerninge the ryfinge the seidge at Elvez, appeares to be true in all the particulars, unlesse the number of men slaine, and taken prisoners, which are not found to be one quarter of what are mentioned in the relation, which I received from the secretary of state. However, that losse is so confidderable to the Spaniard, as makes the Portuguez confident they shall not be molested this year in these partes of Alentexio; but 'tis to be doubted they will find the contrary, if the plate-fleete arryve; for the succeffe the Spaniard hath had by taking Mouson in the north of Portugale, will extreamly animate them to procecute the warr againste those people, whom they know to be extreamly dyvided amongst themselves. The queen begins to be sensible of many miscarriages caused by the animosities and treachery of some of the nobillity, which shee endeavours to prevente by a new modle in the army; but hitherto shee can effecte nothinge; for after the takinge Mouson, the queen made use of the conde de St. Lorenzo for generall; but he found so stronge a party to oppose him, as that he was soone laid by. Then the queen mad choyce of the conde de Soyro, which doth as much disguste another party: som cry up Johany Mendez, who was generall of Badajor, others will have the army comanded by commissioners pretending, as things now stand, that the command of the army will be too great a trouble for one man. The queen doth what she can to get an army into the field to besiedge Mouson, hoping to retake it; but there doe not wante those that crosse that design; and God knowes what will be the event of these confusions. If the Portuguez had not had that myraculous success at Elvez against the opinion of most men, and (I may safely say) against the wishes of many, this kingdome had been before this tyme in the possession of the Spaniard.

I have seen severall letters lately from Cadix and other places, besides what intelligence I had myselfe; and all write, that the plate-fleete is infallibly expected at Cadix every hour; that the five Holland shipes, which the duke of Medina sente out to meete the fleete, have order to send them directly for the way of Cadix, being the English fleet is not on the coast. The fleete comes wonderfull rich, and though they have many stoute shipes, twenty English frigots might become master of the greateste parte of thire treasure. If the Spaniard loose this fleete, he is ruined; for all the next summer's expeditions will depend upon the arivall of the plate. We have now eight or ten greate English Merchant ships in this harbour, and moste of them out of employment, a thing that I have not knowne till now in this place. The late miscarriage of severall of our shipes in the Straits, and other places, I conceive to be partly the cause; and the late peace made with Tripoly by captain Stoakes doth extreamly prejudice our navigation; for we have beene told by Italians, and severall of other nations, that formerly fraighted many English shipes, (else I would not have troubled your honour with this relation) that if their goods muste be delyvered as prize, and thire persons slaves to the enemy, (as, we have intimation, the 3. article of the treaty expresses) they had rather truste their goods with the moste cowardliest nation in the world. I cannot forbare to implore your honour's assistance for some reliefe for the intollerable abuses wee suffer from the ministers of justice in this place, which proceeds from their Spanish hearts and hatred to our nation. I beseech the Lord ever to blesse and prosper your honour, and this shall allwayes be the hearty prayer of

Your Honour's faithfull servant,

THO. MAYNARD.

This instante arrived an English ship from Tercera, that reports captain Coppinge hath taken two Dutch shipes, but cannot tell me, whether they came from the West India, or else they are some that came out of Cadiz; have advise, that four greate Genoa ships are gonn into Cadiz, supposed they will assiste the plate-fleet.

General Monck to secretary Thurloe.

MY LORD,

I RECEIVED your lordship's of the 10th instant. I had some letters from Dr. Clarges, A.D. 1658; that Mr. Stuart and Mr. Eyres were chosen in England. For Mr. Thomas Drury, that you recommended, hee has failed in the place, to which he was recommended; but if you desire itt, I shall take care, that when the next writts come, hee shall bee chosen. I am heartily sorry the sheriffs are soe negligent in sending uppe the indentures. Major Knight is chosen heere, and colonel Fitch in the northerne parts; but their indentures are nott come to hand, and the sheriffs are soe farre asunder, and some of them absent, that they cannot meete soe suddenie as was expected; but major Knight will bee sent you speedily. I hope such as have bin sent from Scotland will bee faithfull to his highnesse. I am very glad to heare thinges goe on soe well. I hope, that they may bee well settled; notwithstanding the diversities of opinions of men. Having received the inclosed from Tinnmouth Castle, I thought fit to send it to your lordship, and remayne

Your LORDSHIP'S

very humble servant,

Dalkeith, 15th Feb. 1659.

GEORGE MONCK.

Mr. John Barwick to king Charles II.

May it please your MAJESTY,

YOUR majesty's letter of Dec. 30^o found a safe, but a very slow passage. I received it not till the 27th instant, (the day before this bearer arrived) so that I was not able to hasten the money faster then that slow method would permitt, wherein the merchant had put it for the greater security. But I hope it will be all come to your majesty's hand, before this humble address can. And further for the present I am not able to serve your majesty in the same kind, though I have not been wanting to acquaint some friends (whom I met with here this terme) of what advantage such service might be at this time, and particularly those whom Mr. D. did most rely upon in such cases. I find a deep resentment from them, (and I believe it is reall) but withall a disability at present to do what they desire.

The 100 l. which Mr. Shaw received for your majesty's use, was part of the 635 l. given in upon my account, as your majesty may please to be informed by the generall account, which I inclosed in both my former addresses, which was thus:

The whole sume received upon this account	960	00	00
Whereof { Sent in gold by Mr. D. and given in upon account,	125	00	00
{ which your majesty did formerly acknowledge
	325	00	00
Item, Ordered by your majesty to be delivered back	200	00	00 to the person, from whom I received it
Sum remaining	635	00	00

Of this Mr. Gregson told me there was something wanting in some of the baggs, which I hope your majesty will be pleased to ascribe (as the truth is) to the severall depositings and removals of it. Of the two it is the greater wonder, that so much was preserved in so many and great distractions. The other parcell was just 500 l. which I hope is also received by this time. And if it be, I humbly beg the favour, at your majestie's best convenience, that I may have two severall notes of acknowledgment of the receipt of them for the fuller satisfaction of those by whom I was intrusted. I have, according to your majestie's command, sent a narrative (hastily and rudely patched up) of such occurrences as this place affordeth; but fearing it might be too tedious for your majesty to peruse, I have inclosed it to my lord chancellor to represent so much of it to your majesty, as his lordship shall think your majesty will have the patience to hear.

I humbly thank your majesty for your gracious acceptance of my duty in what I have done. My case is such, as I dare not adventure so farr as I desire in your majestie's service, having

A.D. 1658. others bound with me in a deep penalty. But where I dare trust and am trusted, nothing but better abilities shall be wanting in him, who is dutiful subject.

Your MAJESTY's most obliged and most London, Febr. 16. 1658.

Indorsed, These for his sacred majesty.

Mr. John Barwick to Sir Edward Hyde.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Febr. 16. 1658.

In the possession of Joseph Radcliffe, of the Inner Temple, esq;

I HOPE it is not unknown to your lordship, how cross the wind hath been of late; and therefore I need not apologize for this slow account of your lordship's letter of Dec. 30. which I received but the 7th instant.

My worthy friend, of whos health your lordship is so desirous to hear, continues a slow, but I hope a safe, recovery. He is well in health, and chearfull, but keeps his chamber for fear of a relaps: and I doubt not, by the blessing of God, but a litle more of the spring will restore him to perfect health.

I have sent your lordship a litle book by this bearer. The reason of my boldness is, because I have heard (how true, I know not) that your lordship did so well approve of a former piece of the same author upon the same subject, as to commend it to his majestie's reading. This I told to a friend nearly related to the author, and withall, that perhaps I might be instrumentall to him in putting one of these books into your lordship's hand; whereupon he gave me this to dispose of as I pleased, which I understood very well. His condition is such, as not to be too lavish in expressions; but your lordship may presume of his service to yourself, and humble duty to his majestie. I leave your lordship to conjecture the person.

I had the same command from his majesty, which your lordship was pleased to lay upon me, for a narrative of such occurrences as this place affords. And because I was affrayd to burthen his majesty with such a long scribe to so litle purpose, I have made bold to inclose it to your lordship, humbly begging your favor to mediat my pardon, if I have offended in it, and to represent so much of it to his majesty, as your lordship shall think fitting, together with this inclosed humble address.

My sick friend presents his very humble service to your lordship, and all yours. I hope the small parcell of goods, which I sent by his direction, is received: and if so, my humble suite to your lordship is, that some acknowledgement of it may be sent for the satisfaction of others.

I humbly thank your lordship for the high favour you express towards one, that can so little deserve it as myself. My heart is large enough to honour you, but (though other abilities were answerable) my hands are so tyed in bonds, as I cannot, as I desire, express myself to be your lordship's most humble servant.

Indorsed, For L. C.

General Monck to secretary Thurloe.

My LORD,

Vol. lxiii.
p. 146.

THE governor of Berwick doth earnestlie desire your assistance (and I likewise in his behalfe) in getting of him the fishing, that is neere Berwicke, which his late highnesse promised to give him, in case the towne of Berwicke had noe right to itt, which I thinke will bee made appeare clearlie. Truly, hee is a very honest stout gentleman, very faithfull to the government, and one that hath suffered much in that businesse, which is mentioned in his highness letter, being his late highnesse tooke him from his being major of horse to bee lieutenant-colonell to Sir Arthur Hestlarigge; and truly his highnesse will doe a very charitable worke: in case it bee cleare to his highnesse to conferre it upon him, I shall take itt as a great favour done to

17th Feb. 1658.

GEORGE MONCK.

Mr.

Mr. John Barwick to Sir Edward Hyde.

THE proceedings at Westminster are so full of distraction, that it is probable they will end in confusion. For the one party thinks the protectorists cannot stand, and the other, ^{A.D. 1658.} that the commonwealth cannot rise; and those, that are indifferent men, hope both may be true; and then the conclusion will be easy to foresee and foretell. ^{In the possession of Joseph Radcliffe, of the Inner Temple, esq;}

Since their first convention, the 2 houses have never owned one the other. Those they call lords meet and adjourn, and consult about making a catechisme, and make speeches against playes and the common-prayer-book. But all mens eyes are upon the commons; for it is clearly foreseen, the petition and advice will not support the other house for want of expression rather than intention: for the words of it are, that the protector (without mentioning his successors) may call such a number to sit in the other house, and thereupon the commons look upon it as a personall privilege of the last protector. To prevent this mischief, the protector's party brought in a bill Jan. 31. for a recognition of the protector, wherein were some comprehensive phrases for the other house, the militia and negative voyces; but now that it comes to scanning, it finds no small opposition. From their first meeting the commons have consisted of 2 extreme parties, (one for the protector, the other for a comonwealth) and a moderat party between both; which beeing more or less moderat, as occasion serves, are able to cast the scales on which side they please; and this makes the foresight of things very obscure, though most men think it will end in a titular protector without either militia or negative voyce, if he be so tame as to submit to it. The republicans are the lesser party, but are all speakers, zealous, diligent, and have the better cause, admitting those common principles, (which are not yet exploded) by which they destroyed monarchy in the long parliament. And yet the other can outvote them, when they please; for the old paralogisme holds (as well as their other principles) to deny the conclusion, though they take the premisses for granted.

The great contest hath been, and still is, concerning the recognition, &c. After 7 dayes debate (all other business set apart) they came to a vote on monday night at 10 a clock, that this protector shall be chief magistrate, with such powers and limitations as they shall agree upon, yet so as this vote shall signify nothing, till they come to that agreement. Upon the second of those 7 dayes (8th instant) a petition was brought up by severall well-willers to a commonwealth in and about London; but such interventions being præcluded by a vote of the house, 4 members were sent out to complement them, and promise their petition should be read, and taken into consideration, when their present debat was over, which the petitioners looked upon as a reprove after execution. And yesterday the petition was received and read, but no thanks returned to the petitioners, as they expected. But we hear there is a petition or remonstrance to the same effect now a subscribing by severall of the army, which likely will find a better and quicker admittance. Both these petitions (or either of them) may still find them work enough; for there are 2 or 3 difficult questions to be decided before the previous vote (as they call it) can take effect, concerning the militia, negative voyce, and the other house, wherein the moderate party are not so zealous as they were to have the government continue in the same frame they found it. And if some of the most considerable persons of the other house could but get the house established, they would put hard to lodge the militia and negative voyce in that house, which perhaps in time they would have consist wholly (as it doth for the most part) of the chief officers of the army.

Since the previous vote on monday night, that bill hath slept, and the protectorists are willing it should do so for some time, that the house may slide on into other business, that may require a bill to be passed, on purpose that by signing of it the protector may take possession of his chief magistracy according to the previous vote. But the difficulty is, the commons will not own the other house, and the protector cannot well sign any thing without passing both houses, though otherwise the temper of some leading men in the other house begins allready to shew itself to be such, as he could wish he were fairly ridd of them; for the republicans reckon of 12 colonells, (now in command) that will be for them, and 6 of them at least are of that house. If this petition of the army goes on, the houses will not signify much after a while. The protector allready relies upon the great officers of the army, and the republicans on the under officers more than upon the votes of either party. But it is thought the protector will be mistaken in some of those he relies upon, if the other party appears any whit considerable. Monk hath given him a caution allready to carry fair with the parliament; for he finds some reason to suspect his army will divide upon these matters. And I am told by one of the house, he verily believes they will shatter all to pieces, when the poynt of the militia comes to be debated; for though the last vote was carryed 3 to one, yet he thinks the protector will never gett more as to the militia, then to be such a generall as must be accountable to the parliament. Others think Fairfax will have that office, some commissioners being joyned with him, because they will hardly trust

A.D. 1658. trust so much power in any one man's hand. He sides with the republicans, and carries a name above Lambert for the present. It is still a great question, whether or noe there will be any assizes this vacation. It is said there are 150 lawyers, that sit in the house; and the protector cannot want them during the circuit, and dare not disoblige them by having none. He hath been on and off 2 or 3 times about it, and at last he has putt it upon the commissioners of the great seall and judges to consider, so that it is likely he would be dissuaded from it by their advice.

I cannot learn what caballs and junctos are working under hand; but I am told the protectorists had their night-meetings at Fleetwood's house till 3 or 4 days ago, which being not so now, it makes some suspect he is fallen off to the republicans; others more probably think he is the leader of that third party, who are for a mere titular protector. The commons are now about examining the accounts of the treasury for this last year. The publick debt (it is thought) will amount to a million and a half at least. Some contests there have also been about calling persons to account upon faillures in government; and there hath been somewhat tryed on both sides by way of crimination and recrimination before and since the dissolution of the long parliament; but hitherto it has not broke out into good earnest, excepting the mayn question of the government in one person or many. Only this day Young of Shropshire, a protectorist, and Nevill of Berkshire, a prime republican, have been accused of atheisme, and have time allowed them to answer their severall charge. If all atheists be expelled the house, there will be work enough for new elections. In all their lat contests about monarchy I have not heard of any (even of the long parliament) excepting Mr. Scot, that have spoken any way reproachfully of his late majesty; only Sir Hen. Vane sayd, (and truly enough) that if the power of government was not in the people, the guilt of the king's blood would ly upon them for ever. Some glances also have been made upon his present majestie's cause, and most of them in the better sense; but none as yet has had the courage to speak to any purpose.

There was never greater complaints in the city for want both of trading and money, and that they are reall, appears by the falling of house-rent in the city 10 per cent. The Spanish merchants especially goe down the wind: not one in ten but finds himself a loser upon his audit this last year. What is got by commodities of Spanish growth in England, is pocketted by the Dutch, insomuch as some suggest to have a law made to lower (or otherwise destroy) all commodities of Spanish growth, that shall be brought into England. No marvell then the city should be so desirous (for so they are allways) to have peace with Spain, and warr with the Dutch. The former, I hear, has been endeavoured underhand; and Whitlock is made one of the keepers of the great seall to give him a title with a greater noyse for an ambassador (as is thought) in order to such a treaty. And yet in this tottering condition they foresee none will treat with them, however otherwise inclinable: but whether the Spaniard be inclinable or no, I know not. It should rather seem, not, by some endeavours there are now on foot to settle an intelligencer for Spain here in England, wherein they desire the assistance of some of the English nation; and this I am well assured of, if it signify any thing.

Great preparations are making for sea. It is sayd, they will have 40 sayll at sea by the middle of the next moneth; and 30 more as fast as they can after. It seemes they are in good forwardness; for there is a press out for 1500 seamen, and a good many are pressed already. The Sound in likelihood will be the chief cause of this expedition; and yet I believe they have one eye upon their own security at home, in case there should be any intestine division.

Febr. 16. 1658. late at night.

General Monck to secretary Thurloe.

MY LORD,

I RECEIVED your lordship's of the 12th instant, and am sorry to heare you make such slowe progresse in your businesse. As for the forces heere, the army was never quieter, nor in better condition, since I comanded heere; and I doubt nott butt by the helpe of God to keepe them soe; for I have given them command nott to meddle with petitioning businesse, nor state businesse; and I am confident they will observe itt, as I have found them ready to doe itt. Our onely want heere is of monie, with which I hope the parliament will take care to supply us. As for judge advocate Whalley to be chosen for Peblis and Selkirke, there is a Scotch gentleman chosen; butt the country will not give him soe much monie as he expects; and so he is not like to goe; but if hee should not goe uppe, and that they should chuse another, which they cannot doe without another writ, I doe not doubt to gett him chosen ; which is all at present from A.D. 1658.

Dalkeith, 17th Feb. 1658.

Your LORDSHIP's very humble servant,

GEO. MONCK.

I doubt nott butt your lordship will bee advised withall concerning our contingent monies, what is fitt to bee allowed us at present. There is 850 l. monthly paid out for the workes ; and for Inverness 200 l. to St. Johnston's, and 200 l. for Ayre, and 350 l. monthly for Leith cittadell ; for the workes would stand still, if he should nott helpe them, being all that, which they were to have out of the excise, is gone ; so that I cannot conceive there can be less allowed than 1100 l. monthly, as there was before for repaire of garrisons, bedding, carriage of provisions, and other contingent charges.

The 20,000 l. safely arrived here in the Amity frigot on fryday last, for which I thank your lordship.

Mr. R. Rookwood to secretary Thurloe.

May it please your HONOR,

I N obedience to your lordship's commands, haveing frequently attended your audience, Vol. lxiii.
an urgent occasion, as I conceive, gives me boldnes to addresse these few propositions p. 149.
in writing; with an earnest desire, if your wisdom judge mee capable, to serve your honor, even with my life.

First, my lord, there are some ill-affected people endeavouring to contrive danger, if it be possible, to your noble person, and speake unworthy things of your honour ; which (if it be your pleasure to call upon mee) I shall discover as far as I can.

2dly, I shall procure, if it please your honor, weekly, the newest letter, sent by a principal Jesuit from Antwerp to Rome, Paris, and Spaine ; and give intelligence concerning many of the priests and Jesuits practises.

3dly, I deliver enclosed the character, by which Charles Stuart directed mee to write weekly to him, and the meanes to retrieve letters and money.

4thly, If the war with Spaine goe on, I shall demonstrate considerable service I may doe your honor ; if it may please your lordship till then to give me any meane employment, who have already suffered much by endeavouring to prove my selfe,

My noble LORD,

This 17th Feb. 1658.

Your honor's most dutifull, faithfull,

obedient servant,

ROBIN ROOKWOOD.

Dr. Thomas Clarges to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELENCY,

I AM so much buffied in my attendance at the house, that I desire your excellency's pardon, if I am not so perticular in forreigne intelligence as I was before. Yesterday In the possession of the the commons house of parliament came to a resolution of that debate, which had ingag'd right hon. the them ever since the 7th instant, and they pass'd two votes: the first was, that it be part earl of Shelburne.
of this bill, (viz. of recognition) to recognize and declare his highnes Richard lord protector to be lord protector and cheif magistrate of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging. The second was, that before this bill be comitted, the house doe declare such additional clauses to be part of the bill, as may bound the protector and cheif magistrate, and fully secure the rights and priviledges of the parliament, and the liberties and rights of the people ; and that this nor any other previous vote is or shall be of force, or binding, to the people, untill the whole bill be pass'd.

This day a petition was presented by Mr. Berners, Mr. Kiffin, and some others, in the name of themselves, and forty thousand others citizens of London, which I am told is the same, that was endeavour'd the last session of the last parliament, and caused his highness to dissolve them.

A.D. 1658. Upon the reading the petition, the house answer'd, that some of the particulars were already under consideration, and such of the rest should be considered, as the house should think fitt. In the meane time the house doe expect, that the petitioners, according to their own expressions, doe acquiesce in the resolutions of the house. It was moved to have thanks given to the petitioners for their good affections; but upon division of the house, it was carried in the negative by 100 voices. I hope things will at last succeed well through much difficulty; for the major part are men very peaceably inclined. The inferior officers of the army have had many consultations about petitioning the parliament; but I heare they agree neither in the manner nor matter of their desires. Those in Scotland are well fixed. I am,

May it please your EXCELENCY,

Your excellencie's most humble, and most obleig'd servant,

THO. CLARGES.

Earl of Thomond to H. Cromwell, lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

Holyhead, fryday 9 in the Morning, 18th Feb. 1658.

MY LORD,

In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburne.

TO let your lordship see how mindfull I am of your commands, even at Holyhead I am encourag'd to persecute you with my scribe; yet my zeale to obey you will not only, I trust, prevaile for my offence now, but for the ills in that nature I shall have the hardnes to present you withall from London. Mr. Mabbott tells me heere nothing but of a vintner, which, not elected, sat as a member, but not for Scotland or Ireland; soe that my lord president Coote, nor others at Dublin, need not suspect being welcomed into the house. The speech of confident Haselrigge against the recognition was found fit only for lawghter in the house; soe that the packet coming from my careful glover, I shall only add, that my head, being ill, was made better by writting, and my heart much cordialised to apprehend, that my lines may be received with that welcome, as my exact obedience presentes them with my lowest reverence to yourselfe and worthy lady: my lord, now and ever to my power,

Your obedient servant,

THOMOND.

My respectes to Mrs. Russell. I can remember Dr. Harison with my letter, though he graced me not with his to Chipman, for feare of offending my lord Claypole att court. Commande Dr. Petit to remember the letter.

The question being propounded,

THAT this house shall proceed to determine the power of the negative voice in the chief magistrate in the passing of laws, before the constitution of the parliament, as to two houses, be first resolved on :

Vol. lxiii.
p. 154.

The house was divided :

The yeas went forth,

Mr. Brewster,

Coll. White,

Sir John Coppleston,

Mr. Francis St. John,

} Tellers for the yea,
} with the yea, 86.

} Tellers for the no,

} with the no, 217.

So the question passed with the negative.

Resolved,

That the house do take into consideration the constitution of the parliaments, as to two houses, the first business to-morrow morning ; and that nothing else do then intervene.

Jo. SMYTH, clerk of the parliaments, to attend the commons.

To the right honourable the representatives of the people of England, assembled in parliament :

The humble petition of Elizabeth Portmans, the afflicted wife of John Portmans, late principal secretary to the generals at sea, now close prisoner in the Tower of London,

Humbly sheweth,

THAT your petitioner's husband hath been always of true and sincere affections to the public cause of God in this nation, and personally engaged in that cause to the utmost of his power. That notwithstanding the premises, he was about a year since violently, and by armed force, taken from his house, by virtue of a warrant from the lieutenant of the Tower, and committed to the Tower of London ; and hath been there ever since strictly confined, without any notice of the reason of his commitment, and without bringing him to a legal trial, though the same hath been earnestly endeavoured and desired by the application of several of his friends to those who were in power.

Your petitioner therefore doth most humbly pray, that your honours will be pleased to take the premises into your tender consideration ; and to take such effectual order herein, as to your wisdoms, upon examining the true merits of the cause, shall seem meet ; that so your petitioner and her suffering family be not unjustly pressed down, and overwhelmed by this affliction.

And your petitioner shall ever pray.

Monday, the 21st day of February, 1658.

ACCORDING to the order of this house made on thursday last, Mr. secretary Vol. lxiii.
Thurloe made a narrative, and gave the house an account of the state of the war, p. 161.
and of the affairs of the kings of Sweden and Denmark, in relation to the Baltic sea, and to the command of the Sound ; and how far, and in what manner, as well his late highness the lord protector deceased, as also his now highness the lord protector, had severally interested themselves in their respective differences by way of mediation. He further gave the house an account of the shipping and forces of the states general of the United Provinces now in the Sound, and what further preparations (as is informed) they are now making. And that his now highness and his council had directed such shipping and forces to be prepared here, as he apprehends may be for the security of this commonwealth in these times of so great action.

Wednesday,

A.D. 1658.

Wednesday, the 23d of February, 1658.

The house, according to the order on monday last, took into consideration the matters then in debate upon the narrative then made to the house by Mr. secretary Thurloe.

Resolved,

That a very considerable navy be forthwith provided and put to sea, for the safety of this commonwealth, and the preservation of the trade and commerce thereof.

Thursday, the 24th of February, 1658.

Resolved,

That it be referred to his highness the lord protector, to put the vote of this house concerning the preparing and putting to sea a considerable navy for the safety of this commonwealth, and the preservation of the trade and the commerce thereof, in execution, saving the interest of this house in the militia, and in making of peace and war.

Resolved,

That Mr. secretary Thurloe be desired to carry this vote to his highness.

Jo. SMYTH, clerk of the parliaments,
to attend the commons.

THE last night I receiv'd an order from the grand committee of parliament for grievances, &c. to bring to-morrow the body of Mr. John Portmans to that committee, together with the causes of his commitment and detainer; and according to that order I have this day received a coppie of Mr. Portman's petition, and am to give an answer to the committee concerning the particular complaynt relating to my selfe; in which I am confident I cannot be charged with any thing, but keeping close to my warrant. The copy of which petition, as alsoe of the warrant for his commitment, &c. I have herein enclosed. I shall have the prisoner there as required, and humbly conceive it convenient Mr. attorney may have notice to be then at the committee. I shall not give you further trouble, but that I am,

I HAVE of late been a little too negligent in my weekly letters. The truth is, here is little to write, besides my frequent illnes, which renders holding down my head troublesom. I hope the frequency of such as have gone from hence have well enough supplied those omiffions. This bearer you know well enough. I have the same respect and confidence in him as formerly; wherefore I desire you will conferr with him about such things as may concern mee, and heare him fully. I am afraid I have not been rightly understood; upon which account, and indeed to settle my own private concerns, not expecting that I and mine should allwayes gnaw upon the publique, I could have wisht, that I might have waited upon his highness; though truly I am of your opinion, that as to some more publique considerations, perhaps 'tis better I am here for the present. I cannot dissemble so much as to say, self-concernment does not sometimes predominat with mee. Pray use this bearer kindly for my sake, who shall doe the like for any freind of yours; and am

MY LORD,

A.D. 1658.

WHEN I came to Hollyhead, there was not any vessel, they being all (by reason of East winds) on this coast for about 10 dayes. At their returne the winde was soe much West, that they could not depart in six dayes. On the 21st instant, by God's blessing, I arrived here, and brought with me the 2 mailles of the 8th and 15th instant, and immediately waited on his excellency my lord lieutenant, and delivered your lordship's letter to him. I also carried my lord chief justice Basell the commission you comanded me. Many of the members of parliament are now preparing for England, and purpose, God willing, to goe to-morrow morning.

I shall not adventure to trouble your lordship with the perticuler circumstances about the letter-office, unlesse you are pleased to signifie your pleasure therein, having given Mr. Noell and Mr. Clerke a full account therof; but shall in all my undertakings most earnestly endeavour to approve myfelfe, Resolution of the states of Holland concerning the garison at Copenhagen.

5. March [1659.]

THE Heer Hugens and other deputies of the affairs of Denmark have reported, that their that in case of good assurance mentioned in their former resolution the sum of 20000 rix-dollars a month for 3 months might be lent to the king of Denmark for maintaining the garison at Copenhagen, &c. as more at large appears in the resolution of the states of Holland of the 13th Feb. last; and that letters may be written to their excellencies deputies, that if peace be made between the two kings, they will endeavour with the ministers of France and England, that the guarantee of the three states may interpose, not only in general, but in particular: also that they feared, that the recruits of the militia of this state now in Denmark might weaken his majesty's forces, or hinder his raising of more, because the officers of the said militia will make use properly of Danish soldiers, leaving it however to the consideration of their high mightinesses, if it were not expedient to think of means to prevent the same. Whereupon, after deliberation, their high mightinesses thanked them for their pains; and it was resolved on the first point to require the provinces to declare themselves speedily; on the second point, that letters should be written accordingly to their excellencies deputies; and for the third, that the council of state shall be consulted.

General

Colonel Barkstead to Secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

I BELIEVE you have had an accompt (ere this) what was the sence of the grand committee yesterday, upon the bringing of Portmans thither. Notwithstanding my producing my lord protector's letter under his highnes owne hand, and a full warrant, (as I apprehended) some seeme to dislike my shewing that letter; but such was my affection and faithfulness to his highnes commands, I did not imagine the doing that would have reflected upon his honour, which I esteemed my great encouragement. I heartily wish this occasion had been prevented, either by Portman's discharge before, or such warrant given for his detayner, as might have justified me more. Sir, I am confident I shall be brought againe upon the stage by severall prisoners in my custody. These committed by the warrants inclosed, I suppose, will be forwardest; and therefore humbly desire your honour will take it into consideration, that as I have kept close in obedience, soe I may not be left lyable to the malice of particular men. I shall not doubt of your tendernes herein, who am,

Your honour's most affectionate friend,

and hearty servant,

J. BARKSTEAD.

Sir, I suppose the report touching Portmans will be made to-morrow morning to the house.

General Monck to Secretary Thurloe.

MY LORD,

I HAVE received your letter, dated the 17th instant. I am glad to heare, that the affaires of parliament succede soe well, though but slowlie. I am sorry some officers of the army should trouble themselves with thinges they have nothing to doe withall; but you neede not doubt for the officers heere. I hope wee shall give you noe trouble noe way, but be satisfied with what his highnesse and the parliament shall settle. For newes here wee have none. All thinges are quiet and well, which is all at present from

Dalkeith, 24th Feb. 1658.

Your LORDSHIP's very humble servant,

GEO. MONCK.

*An information.*London, Feb. 25th, 1658.

A RELATION of some discourse, which passed on or about the 17th day of this instant Feb. at a public-house near the said exchequer, where speaking concerning the brewers in the city, and how ill they were dealt with by the farmers of the excise of beer and ale, one Mr. Barret a seller of tobacco at the sign of the George in Bread-street said, that some particular brewers within the city, pretending to farm the excise of beer and ale of the present farmers, who should notwithstanding continue commissioners, and have a certain yearly allowance for it, had some conference about it with one Dashwood and Young, officers to the present farmers; and amongst other things it was objected by the brewers, who pretended to be new farmers, that they feared, that those other brewers, who were obstinate or negligent in paying their duty, would in case of distress made by their officers, have relief at common law; to which was answered, by either Dashwood or Young, or both, that as for that, secretary Thurloe had undertaken to hinder all process at law against the farmers officers of excise of beer and ale, for which he was to have of the present farmers 1000 l. per annum. And further the said Barret did say, that one having a distress made upon his goods, going to sheriff Robinson of this city for a warrant of replevy, he refused it, and told him, that he had an order from secretary Thurloe not to grant any. And the said Barret being asked, if he had this relation from a good hand, made answer, he had it from one of the said brewers; and said moreover, that since

A.D. 1658. since some of the brewers had been with secretary Thurloe, and acquainted him with their intentions of setting forth their grievances by way of petition to the parliament; and that he had now undertaken to present their petition in the house, and promised them to stand their friend upon all occasions. This was spoken in the presence of John Edwards, and Hugh Upton, and another gentleman.

Mr. S. Morland to secretary Thurloe.

May it please your Honour,

Vol. lxiii.
p. 117.

I ACQUAINTED your honour some months since with my declining condition, by the nothingnesse of my signett fees, (which hardly maintayn my clerk) and the fayling of that addition, which you had assigned mee; whereupon your honour was pleased to assure mee, that you would make some speedie provision for mee, and did give mee immediately an earnest thereof, for which I return you my most humble thanks, and without which I had then fallen into some inconvenience. Truly, Sir, I am now constrained to renew my request, foreseeing a storme, without some speedy reliefe. Mr. Noell, who was formerly so kind to lend me 150 l. was lately pleased to presse mee to speedy payment by the mouth of Mr. Robinson his factor; and finding I had not readie monie, obliged mee to bind myselfe in a bond of 600 l. to reimburse the said sum in 6 months, as you may see by the annexed copy of the said bond. There bee some others do the like. These and other considerations oblige me to put off my house, and much of my furniture of halfe the money it cost mee; and in the meane time, I am constrained to take a private country house (besides a lodging in the city) for my wife to divert her melancholly, which is very far grown upon her, to see my affaires go thus backward. I must confesse I hid it from her, till I was faine to take of hers to supply my occasions; whereas, if I had but enjoyed what your honour was pleased to assign mee, I need not have been put to any of the aforesaid inconveniencies, but lived cheerfully and plentifully, and laid up something yearly. And now I cannot sleep for thinking, what shall become of those, that I may (I know not how soon) leave behind mee. The truth is, I have no freind but my innocency and fidelity to pleade with your honour for mee. I have very many enemies, that will be very joyfull to see mee miscarry; which I must do, and that speedily, if your honour do not remember, and make some provision either at home or abroad for

FRANCISCO MELLIO.

H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland, to secretary Thurloe.

SIR,

Vol. lxiii.
p. 205.

AT Sir Paul Davis his returne hither forth of England, I found him to acknowledge with much thankfulnes the favours he received there from you upon my letters to you concerning him; and therefore I must also acknowledg to you with speciall thanks your frendly lines to mee therein. After my acceffe to this government, he petitioned mee concerning the office of clerke to the councill here granted to him for life by letters pattents under the great seale, long before the rebellion in Ireland; and by him enjoyed accordingly accordingly for many yeares, which his petition I communicated to the councell; and A.D. 1658. considering the justnes of his pretensions, his commendable deportment all along in the variety of changes and distractions, hapning from the begining of the rebellion here, and troubles there, his service in England under the parliament for several yeares in that time, and his great sufferings in his estate by the rebels, for his adhering to the English interest, myself and the councill here have thought fitt, that he should have a lease of 2000 acres of forfeited profitable lands in the countie of Catherlogh, at three-pence an acre yearly, and 500 acres of forfeited profitable lands in the countie of Dublin, at six-pence an acre yearely, for so many yeares as wee are in present authorized to grant such lands, being but 21 yeares. And I confesse freely to you, I perswaded him to yeeld to that uppon my promise to him, that that tearme should be enlarged by his highnes to fourscore and nineteene yeares; wherein he was content to acquiesce, though even that bee farr below that, which in this case he had reason to expect.

I therefore send you herein enclosed a draught of a letter to that purpose, prepar'd here for his highnes signature, and that in such a way, as it may not bee drawne into example by others, together with a few lines from my selfe to his highnes in that gentleman's behalf. The reason of inserting in the letter the supernumerary forty acres in each of the two counties, is partly to prevent inconveniencie to the gentleman, if upon any new or more strict admeasurement, the lands should hereafter bee found to contain a few acres more than the former admeasurement, which might in such case endanger the validitie of the grant, if not to holpen by the letter, and partly to give us a latitude of letting him have a few acres more then the just number at first designed for him, if it bee found needfull for his accommodation, which for so small a matter is not worth the insisting on, and cannot bee of any inconvenience to his highnes. And I earnestly desire you to take an opportunitie as to present to his highnes my letters directed to him, so to acquaint him with this of mine to you upon this subject, and to offer to him for his signeing a letter according to the enclosed draught, which I hope he will vouchsafe to signe, it being in divers respects for his honour and advantage of his service. And when you shall have obtained his highnes signature of the letter, you may bee pleased to send it under the signett to mee by the post; wherein as you will performe an act of favour to a worthy and well-deserving person, so you will thereby add much to the many other obligations you lay on mee in your continued respects and freindliness to

Your assured loveing friend and servant,

March 1st, 1658.

H. CROMWELL.

Henry Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland, to the protector Richard.

May it please your HIGHNES,

I HUMBLY crave leave at this time to interpose my mediation to your highnes, in the case of a very well-deserving person, namely Sir Paul Davis knight, of whose commendable deportment all along in the variety of changes and distractions happening from the begining of the rebellion here, and troubles there, I have received full testimony; which concurring with my own particular observation of him during my being here, I finde just cause to value and esteem him as a person of worth, deserving your highnes's favour and encouragement. I have now written to Mr. secretary, who will present to your highnes for your signature a letter concerning that gentleman; and I beseeche you give mee leave to make it my humble suite to you to signe it, seeing it is for the advantage of your service, as in the honour and justice of the act, soe alsoe in this, that others well-affected to your person and government will then see, (for their own encouragement) that Sir Paul Davis, who they know merrits favour and respect, is valued accordingly by your highnes, which I humbly submit to your highnes's excellent judgment. I remane

To H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

SIR,

A.D. 1658.

in the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburne.

I AM in hopes, that my last had the honour, which I designed it, and kyst that hand, to which my ambition addressed it. All that I have to feare is, whether it be not troublesome to you to converse with cansters. If my language and intentions be understood and become intelligible, I have my end. But I have reason to feare, knowing how ill a master I am of the English tongue. The distractions of our family will, I doubt, hardly be composed without suites in law. The sheriffe, with his posse comitatus, may doe much; but it will be, in my opinion, litle lesse then a miracle to see things settle without the mediums of force and violence. If we could but once prevaile with the grand ladies of our house to become sociable towards theyr neighbours, I should begin to thinke, that at least in some time we might doe somethinge; though this will be but a very bare beginning of our maine worke, which chiefly consists in secureing your freind, which is the heyre of the house, the despoyleing of whome must unquestionably prove fatall to all our concernments. I thinke however, that if my cozin, who came over with me, and some few others might be taken of, though with the present settlement of present annuities upon them for their lives, we might master our aymes; but at present they are so inflexible, that I cannot but suspect the issue. I hope, Sir, you understood my defines and ends to have my letter of attorney, by which I acted upon your commands, revoked; and that the reasons, upon which I grounded my requests in that perticular, were of sufficient weight to obteyne your allowance, and to prevaile with you to consent to my intentions of travelling, upon those motives, which I therein suggested. I am, Sir, the same thing, which your noble favours have made me; nothing in this world can race out that impression, which you have fixed upon my soule. You shall allwayes governe and steere me as you please: but I abhorre new masters; nor can I lyve under them any more, then I can subsist without the favours of my mistresse. To find the propps of our family distrest and disarm'd by those servants, whome he call'd only for his assistance and support, secrett caballs carryed on to make him no more the master, but only the shaddowe of the master of his howse; to see those men disregarded, whom he called to endeavour his advantage, nay his counsellors, (whose very professions give them title to serve him) though learned in the lawes, and best versed in the condition of his estate, esteemed of noe credit and authoritye, and secrett endeavours made to drawe indictments against them meerey for givinge just and conscientious advices to their clyent, is not (seriously) in my power; nor doe I pretend myselfe so much master of my owne passions, as to continue in the same territories, where such things are acted. It was from hence I begged that libertye, which I hope by the next post you will assure me you are resolved to grant me, especially being secured, that Cælum, non animum, mutant, qui trans mare currunt; and that I shall never goe so farre as to be out of the reach of your commands, which shall at all times have power both over the life and fortune of,

SIR,

London, the first of March, 1658.

Your most humbly faithfully devoted servant,

H. H.

If your occasions drawe you to the castle, I pray doe me the favoure as to deliver the inclosed with your owne hands.

The parliament newes stands thus, as I am inform'd: Last thursday, after a debate of 16 howres, the house sitting till 12 of the clock at night, the speedy preparing of a navye to sett out to sea, for the securitye of the commonwelth, and preservation of the commerce and trade thereof in the Baltick sea, was referred to his highnesse, (the councill being allowed no share therein, nor suffer'd to be nam'd in the house) but with a caution of keeping a good correspondency betweene us and other allies, and saveing the right of the militia in the parliament. The same day Portman was discharged, and the lifetenant of the Towre (to whome they will not allow the title of lord) checkt for his illegall (as they call'd it) imprisonment. Saturday, yesterday, and this day, in the debate of the other howse. But in this grand affayre, the house is much divided, some being for the old peeres only, some for the new lords only, and others for both together, while the comonwealth partye sett still, resolveing to give theyr vote to the greatest disadvantage of his highnesse. Nothing being yet resolv'd, the further debate hereof is adjourn'd till to-morrowe. This I accidentally glean'd up, and resolve to give it you, though contrary to my naturall inclination, which affects not to meddle with state affaires. Nam quæ supra nos, nihil ad nos, has been my opinion.

Col. Shapcote to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

I AM informed by my good friend Mr. Thomas Gorges, that his highnes (uppon your A.D. 1658. recommendation) hath bine pleased to grant unto me the attorney's place of Ireland. Vol. lxiii. As this obligation from his highnes binds me to study his service, foe your peticular P. 230. respect unto me in this hath layne uppon me a greater debte then ever I shall be able to pay, unlesse you be pleased to accept the will for the deed. The truth is, I have not words enough to expresse my thankfulnesse. All that I shall begg from you is, that you would imploy me in something, wherein I might shew myselfe your servant. I dare not trouble you with many words, well knowing that you have fewe minutes to cast away; and shall therefore humbly take my leave, remaining

I question not but that your lordshipp hath hard and seene of them, foe that I shall not need to say any more, then that they are of dangerose consequence as to—and all the partie are extremely taken with them. You litle think, how the newes for passing the vote for recognition of his highnes trubled the A. I speak nothing but one sure knowledge: therfore believe mee, the A. B. and those of the vantage crew are your two antagonists, throughout the whole*. But that might have been helped long since, pardon mee. Sir, I could tell you how 'tis fed, that one partie is for the other house to consist of the ould lords, and another of the new; and that the third hering the debates, smiles in silence at you boath: these they title the ould statift, with many such-like passages, which pleaseth very much; and how they will . . . you a . . . at last. And it was likewise the case of one Mr. Villiers of this parliament; and therefore I heartily wish the electors at Higham to bee well advised, what they doe

Vol. lviii.

AT this instant arrived here the Fagons, captain Paiber commander, by whom received the accompanied paquets, and saith, he received them at Gottenburgh the 23d of February, but was then iced in, and could not presently come out; but by his men, and by the help of two hundred men more, which he had from the governor, cut a way for his ship a mile through the ice, and set sail the first instant; and there were in that port only three of the king of Sweden's ships, which had been plying so long in the Baltic, that with cold and for want of provisions they were almost starved; for the trimming of which ships they were making way at his coming from thence, and will, as he supposeth, be ready by May. And I inquired of him, what other news; who saith, that Gottenburgh being a remote place, hath little to inform; only Greenly, that brought the paquets to him, informed, that he was at Ellsenor the 11th February, when the king of Sweden stormed Copenhagen, but was beaten off with the loss of one of his generals, one major-general, four colonels, eight lieutenant-colonels, and about four hundred men killed, and five hundred wounded. From hence little to inform. Here are one-and-twenty ships of your fleet, some of which want men; but here are supernumeraries in others to supply them. They have been endeavouring to get men for the ships behind, but find a slackness in all down officers to that duty, and men flying the press as from an enemy. Not having else remaining

MY LORD,

In the possession of the right honourable the earl of Shelburn.

THE owning the lords house, as now constituted, has long hung doubtfully, but is at last brought to some ripeness; so that most believe this night's debate will make us capable of a regular settlement, or tell us we must not hope it. I intended your lordship some more particulars, but am surprized with a sodain indisposition, both in head and stomach; and count Broghill has assured mee, your lordship shall have all from his pen, which will be as empty, as matters will beare. I shall therefore now humbly beg your lordship's pardon, and for this post only, promising to be in the future as constant and particular, as health will suffer.

An intercepted letter of king Charles II.

SIR,

In the possession of the right honourable Philip lord high chancellor of Great Britain.

MY last to you was of the eleventh of this month; since which I have received yours of the 17th of February, and acknowledge myself much obliged to you for your care concerning my lord Craven's business, whereof I have herein sent you some further instructions in the particulars you desired, which I received from his servant here. We have here the sad news of the great loss the gallant king of Sweden hath had before Copenhagen, which he stormed twice very furiously, but was beaten off with the loss of about 3000 men, besides divers prisoners. Among the dead there were found six general officers; honest Sir William Vavasor was one, and a brother of the earl of Roxborough. The gallant king is resolved resolved to storm it again; but 'tis thought that in the town they are much too strong for A.D. 1658. him. The Hollanders are providing a fleet of forty ships and 4000 land-men to assist the king of Denmark. I wish the English fleet may arrive at the Sound before the Dutch. The peace between France and Spain is said to be far advanced, the cardinal making it his work to effect it without the interposition of any foreign princes or states. The French, I hear, have no great kindness for the commonwealth of England, which hath contributed so effectually to their great successes in Flanders. Don John is at Paris, tho' incognito, but much caressed there by the queen regent and the cardinal. I hope the parliament will settle all differences so in England, as the French may have cause to repent their ingratitude to our nation, whom they have so much despised. I shall be glad to hear of your health; as being

To H. Cromwell lord lieutenant of Ireland.

SIR,

BY my last, which was delivered unto you by the same hand, from whome you will receive this, you will easily, I hope, discern what opinion I have of my master's present condition, and of the affayres of our divided family. Whether I shall be found to err in my judgment, or not, time will shew: but neverthelesse I esteeme it allways more ingenuous in me to hazard my reputation in that point, then to sayle in my integrity to you, from whom I will not, ought not, to conceale my most inward apprehensions. Hereafter you will receive advices from much better judgments then mine is ever like to prove; yett untill I receive your countermands, I must still looke upon my selfe as engaged to informe you of what occurs; in which I shall be the more confident, since that I doe herein obey your commandes, who will, I hope, preferre the reallitye of my intention before the defects, which shall at any time be discovered in my informations.

Our quarrells are, in my apprehension, so farre from decreasing, that they dayly augment; nor is there (in my opinion) any greates hopes of uniting, since I doe not finde many persons amongst those, who are employed, but such as are byassed with selfe-ends and private interests. They comport themselves generally like souldiers, who have entered and mastered a towne upon storme; everye one seekes to lay hold on what is best for his owne purpose, without any regard to the commandes or advantages of the prince, whom they serve, or of the common equity, which Christians owe unto others upon the generall command, Dilige proximum tuum sicut teipsum. But though every perticular lookes like a subdivision under the grand leaders of theyr faction, (for we may be allowed to applye the worde faction to private as well as publicke schismes) yet are we not without those persons, who in the maine are masters of theyr partyes; from whence it is, that the litle concernments of our private familye runne parallell with those greater of publicke nations, which are torne in peeces by the grandees, that become heades of the malecontent, by whose names they hope to master theyr owne designes. Nor would the same policy, which is made use of by prudent princes in affayres of that nature, be lesse advantagious to our master, then they have beene to the greatest states, if he would please to serve himselfe of them by a timely application. I have never observed in the litle time, wherein I have knowne the world, that any age hath produced publicke persons, who might not by preferment be taken of from the highest interests, to which theyr humours had espoused them. And why may not our master doe his worke by the same mediums? Every man proposeth aliquod bonum to himselfe (either reall or in appearance) as the grand ends of his engagements; and if he may have as much or more offered unto him without hazard, as he seekes after by dangerous adventures, prudence will direct him to the more secure. I could heartily wish, that this way were speedily put in practise by the master of our family; and the rather, for they apprehend it generally to be the wishes even of the greatest sticklers, who doubtlesse would be as glad to be taken of from being our enemyes, as we would be to have them our friends. And if some diligence were used to search out every one's perticular ayme, would not (I am confident) be out of the power of our master to accommodate everye one in theyr owne designe;

A.D. 1658. designe; and by this (which is the only certaine) way to cutt of the head of everye partye, and leave them as helpelesse and as litle capable of doeing mischeife, as trunks or brutes. You are (I suppose) from my last confirmed, how eminent a leader my cozin Arthur is now become, then whome noe one is more esteemed by those, to whom he hath united himselfe. But hath not he his beloved ayme? Certainly you cannot be ignorant of his pretentions, to which he presumes his father and himselfe intituled both in justice and equitie, both in lawe and conscience, though they have beene out of possession twenty yeares. I will not take upon me to judge of his right; but this I dare presume to tell you, (and that purely to yourselfe) that were he put into the possession of what he claymes, it might be more then an ordinarye advantage to my master, and consequently to yourselfe; for if the trustees will be no otherwise satisfied, then by altering the present settlement of our master's estate, (which I have some reason to feare is the designe they drive at) then must all stewards and counsellours be displac't, and new ones put in theyr roome; of which number I question not but the credit and authority, which my cozin has amongst the trustees, will make him one. And whether in this case it were not prudentiall to secure him on our partye, I leave it to you to judge. And against this I know nothing occurs to me by way of objection, save only, that it would be a disobligation to the present possessor. But whether the advancement of persons considerable would not be more for our purpose then the best advantages which wee can expect from that person, who is in that capacity now made use of, your better judgment can determine; to which he submitts all his apprehensions, who is in the best wishes of his soule,

SIR,

Your most faithfull servant,

T. N.

Dr. Tho. Clarges to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

In the possession of the right honourable the earl of Shelburn.

I AM very doubtfull, whither I shall be able this evening to tell your excellency, wee have decided a great question wee have been in debate of ever since wednesday last, which was, whither this house shall transact with the other house as a house of parliament. Yesterday wee sate from eight in the morning till one this morning; and this day wee have bin together since two in the afternoone, and it is now past eight at night; and all that is done, in order to a resolution in this great affaire, is the carrying an addition to the question in the affirmative, viz. saving to such of the old lords their rights, as shall be duly summoned to that house, I know not if I give your excellency the very words of the vote, but I am certaine the sense is so.

And now as the maine question is putting, the house is moved to command the Scotch and Irish members to withdraw, which has now ingaged them in a sharp debate, and given me thereby opportunity to doe this duty to your excellency. From Copenhagen our agent writes, that the Suedes were repulsed at a generall assault, and they have had six hundred of their men killed, and eight hundred wounded; and amongst others colonel Vavasor is killed. I am,

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

Your EXCELENCYE's most humble servant,

London, this 8th of March, 1658.

THO. CLARGES.

Just as I was sealing my letter, by the indisposition of the speaker, the debate is adjourned till to-morrow at ten in the morning; and before the adjournment, the debates about Scotch and Irish members was declined.

ON the 23^d February, I troubled you with the account of my safe arrivall, for which God be praised! This is, my lord, the messenger of noe good newes, as by the inclosed paper will appear. Colonel Temple was much a sufferer in that surprize, loosing most of his owne, and the things he bought for major-general Jephson's lady, being there also in person, but concealed under the name of her gentleman of the horse. The English maile arrived here on the seventh instant about three in the afternoon; but my lord lieutenant seemed seemed to be much wanting of a letter from your lordship, and enquired after your good health. I thought it my duty to acquaint your lordship thus much, as being A.D. 1658.

Your LORDSHIP's most faithful, and most obliged obedient servant,

SAM. BATHURST.

I doe give weekly a perticular account to Mr. Noell and Mr. Clerke, of your lordship's affaires in the post-office here.

Inclosed in the proceeding.

ON the 4th of March, about eleven at noone, a small vessell of nine guns, and about eighty men, Vol. lxiii. approached the head of Hoath, (a neck of land about six miles from Dublin) where P. 248. she did meet seven small ships coming from Chester to that city, and not farre from it tooke them all; amongst which were Philpot, Johnson, and Ball of Chester (Ryder being a little before got in safe); but the pyrat had noe sooner possession of the said ships, but he conveyed the owners or masters thereof on shoare, and told them, that unlesse they did, without any excuse, bring them 435 l. on ship-board the next day by two of the clocke, they would sincke all the said ships and passengers, (being in all, with the seamen, about eighty persons) whom in the meane time they striped, and also pillaged all the ships, taking out what they thought fit in their own ship, and throughing many things into the sea, except grosse goods, and that remained still on board. At the time appointed, the money was carryed, but such prudent care taken by my lord lieutenant, that, if possible, the ships might be delivered, and the same remaine unpaid, which succeeded accordingly; for at the same instant, that they should have bine fetching the money, the Paradox, captain Cowes, and the Harpe, captain Glover, appeared with their frigotts, which put the pyrat in such a freight, that he cut his cables, and got to sea as fast as he could. In the pursuite there was some guns discharged, but it's conceived they did little execution: the pyrat, being a nimble sailer, did out-run them; and the night approaching, they lost sight of her, and left her sailing towards the South-sea, conceiving, that shee was hasting towards Bisca with her purchase: the captain thereof was called Alexandrio Biscano. The pilot was knowne to be one Willmot, who hath bine formerly in Dublin prison: he hath but one hand. Four of the pyrat's men, who came to fetch the money, are now in prison here.

Dublin, 9. March, 1658.

Steele, lord chancellor of Ireland to secretary Thurloe.

HONOURABLE SIR,

THE sence of my respect and duty became lately my monitor to put mee in mynde Vol. lxiii. of the intervale, that had pass't, since I gave you the like interruption as now; and P. 249. howbeit, if I had been willing to have further declyned the being myne owne remembrancer therein, I never could have had a fairer plea, then in this season of your most important affayres, yet I was not willing, that any thing, after so great a silence, should hinder the present tender of my acknowledgments. Wee, that are by our employments related to this place, do desire and hope, that in the great concernments of parliament, wherever a just occasion is offred, Ireland will in its due placé be still remembred, it being generally their great trouble heere, than their remotenes and the difficulty of accesse hither more then to Scotland, should not be an argument of enjoying rather greater then lesse immunities then that doth. I wishe, with due reservations, that may be safe and fitt for both, by means of this parliament, that that which was the motto of those two, and hath since by their union got the start, may be sayd of these, in the accomplishing of a well-grounded union, viz. Cuncti gens una sumus: sic sumus in ævum. It is not fitt for mee to reiterate what hath formerly been any wise from hence represented to you, nor yet anticipate what may shortly bee further done upon a publique accompt. The worst late news from hence is, that a Spanish pyrate, th'other day, seiz'd upon seven or eight vessels, that came laden from Chester towards this place: two little frigotts we had heere made after him, caused the freedome of the vessells and passengers, but the best of their goods were gott on board the pyrate, who after some shott pass't betweene ours and his, by the night and an high wynde, made a shift, wee feare, to escape, one of our frigotts being come backe, but not the other as yett. I beleeeve somewhat will be revived, as to former desires, for prevention of the like abuses, which if not done, will much retarde the planting of this nation, and bee a discouragement to

A.D. 1658. to those imployed about the revenue arising from a free trade; but I remember your affairs, and how little I can contribute therunto by any thing from hence; and therefore only adde, that I am, SIR,

Your most humble and faythfull servant,

Dublin, March 9. 1758.

W. STEELE.

Dr. H. Jones to secretary Thurloc.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Vol. lxiii.
p. 257.

I HAVE not for some time troubled you in this kinde; for I account letters without matter of importance, a trouble to you, and to your serious affaires, of which kind also is this now from me; but that I continue, and shall be on all occasions, vigilant in what concerneth the principall.

As for our condition heere at present, it is (I blesse God) generally composd to a settlement, and that without so much as a suspicion of feare, nothing appeareing probable for a disturbance in any kinde: this, I meane, as to the apprehensions of many; and moste yet have no cause of watchfullnes, notwithstanding, considering the dayly comeings over of the Popish clergie out of Flanders, &c. now more than ordinarily, into severall partes of this nation, particularly of some more eminent, whom I knowe to be active and acting persons, and who have passed to and fro between Flanders and Ireland twice, some thrice, in a short time, some advice also we have had of tamprings with the people, in way of preparation, and persons named; some of them also of ourselves; but so little appeareing (as was said) of probability of troubles, I finde such relations to be litle valued, although not (in my judgment) to be altogether neglected; especially if there be any thing reall in what those emissaries insense into the people, of a breach with the Dutch, if not a conjunction of France and Spaine, whereof they speake more then hopefully: notwithstanding all which, the Irish are generally soe quiet, and certainly without greate assurances of powerfull assistance from abroad, they will not readily and rashly attempt what they are stirred up unto, although (I doubt not but) the motion, and hopes of change, may be well pleasing to them.

Of the Irish in Conaught there is now a meeting, by allowance of his excellency the lord lieutenant, on their desire to that purpose, for representing (they say) their condition to his highnes and to his parliament. They have already concluded, 1. On an acknowledgment to his excellency of that high favour and respect, given them by his lordship, in the liberty of that meeting. 2. They are preparing an addresse to his highnes of the same nature as those from other places and persons in the three nations. 3. They are drawing up a remonstrance of their grievances, amongst which are, 1. The oath of abjuration, grievous in itself, as imposing on their consciences, not yet satisfied, and grievous as to their estates; this taking from them two parts of their estates, and that toties quoties, according to reiterated presentments for newfances, and that after that cutting short of their estates in their transplanting into Conaught, so as in a short time all will be reduced into nothing. 2. The penalties on the act for the sabbath, in their not frequenting the Protestant churches. 3. Oppression in the assessments of them (they say) above any, and that to the consumeing what is remaineing of their fortunes. 4. They represent the non-performance of articles of warre, of which instances are given. 5. That they have not the benefit of the lawes, particularly of the act for their settlement in Conaught, their estates being disposed otherwaies in the other provinces, and none given in Conaught to very many of them, notwithstanding their decrees for it, with many other passages of that kinde. 6. That they are prosecuted legally in the courts of justice in Dublin, and for non-appearance they are sued to outlawries and rebellion, they not being permitted in the mean time to leave Conaught, (as they pretend) and being by an act subject to banishment, if attempting it without licence. This is what is yet come to my hand of that busines, which I give your honour for a previous consideration of it, and that thereby you may judge something of the condition of a people under such resentments, and how farre impressions may be probably heere made by such as make their advantage of it, in order to a disturbance, as their shall be occasion. So I humbly take leave, and remaine

YOUR HONOUR'S

Moste faithfull and reall servant,

Dublin, March 15. 1658.

HEN. JONES.

To John Baldwyn esq; at his house in the Tower of London.

SIR,

ALTHOUGH this come to you not subscribed, the contents are honest and of A.D. 1658. moment. One is premised, that you should not reject it, before you have perused the papers inclosed, which are to informe you concerning one Mr. Ralph Suckley, who sits in parliament as a member chosen for the town of Higham Ferns, in the county of Northampton; and that it is conceived, according to the rules for qualification of members of parliament, mentioned in the petitions and advice, hee is rendered incapaable of the trust reposed in him. And the instance of the incapacity will appeare to you in the copy of the affidavit inclosed, made by one Mr. Tho. Searle, an officer in the court for probate of wills, attending in the office in Warwicke lane, London. The affidavit is filed and entred in the court of chancery, attested by the officer there, and is its deposeinge, when called will justify his act . . . the letter inclosed (intended to prevent future inconveniencies) written by major-generall Boteler to captain Backhouse, wherein the affidavit was inclosed, by reason that the captain was not uppon the place, and for that the election of Mr. Suckley was a day or two, before it could be speeded thither, availed not; and soe was by his friend, to whom the contents of it were imparted, opened, and is herewith sent you for further information.

And thus it happens, that you are hereby desired by your friend, who is assured, that you love your country, and regard the articles in the premisses specified in the humble and additional petitions and advice, (if you please) to communicate this affaire to your countryman col. Biscoe, that by your meanes the sense of the house or comity of priviledges (by fumoning the deponent, or otherwise) may be knowne in this case, which is conceived to be very materiall in the opinion of him, that hath never received damage or profit by Mr. Suckley, and is a lover of peace and peace-makers, and hearkens after the effect hereof, and is,

SIR,

General Monck to secretary Thurloc.

MY LORD,

I AM desired by the bearer hereof, commissary Rosse, to write two or three lines to you in his behalf, that you will bee pleased to afford him any lawfull favour you may in dispatching of any businesse shall come in your way, whereby you may doe him a courtesie. Hee is one, that hath bin very faithfull to the English interest, and has done us very good service, and I know no recompence he hath had for itt, and I could never fasten any monie uppon him. Hee is now a member of this parliament, and I am confident hath carried himselfe as an honest man. I am loath to trouble you with thinges of this nature, but for such persons, as have carried themselves soe well towards our interest. I must crave your pardon for this, and remayne

Your LORDSHIPPE's very humble servant,

Dalkeith, 17. Mar. 1658.

GEORGE MONCK.

The protector to general Montagu.

MY LORD,

BY your instructions you are to demand the flagge of such foreign ships of war as you shall rencounter in the British seas, upon which some doubt hath been, how far the British seas extend. But not being willing to determine that in our instructions, we rather put in general terms the British seas only. We judge there is no question of all the sea on the side of the Shagenriffe: on the other side you had need be tender, and to avoid all disputes of this nature, if it be possible, because war and peace depends on it.

SIR,
YESTERDAY in the morninge I went up to Hen. Nicolls, and desired him to shew me the place where he saw the things mentioned in his letter; and he came alonge with mee to the place, and told me all the circumstances of it; soe that I take it for absolute truth. When I came to his hous, there was a friende of his and ours come from Stritton, that told me, that som of the Lavalers in those parts hath two or three musquetts a-peice in their houses, and that he did offer to buye one or two of them; and they say, they must dress them up, for there will bee occasion for them this summer. Wee are to have a greate cockinge the next or the other weeke in Pontesbury, if it bee not prevented. I pray you, send this letter with your owne hands to the high sheriffe by the post, and see that it bee safe delivered to him. Inclose it in one of yours, if you can with conveniency. If it be not directed right, alter it. Perfwade Mr. Gilbert from me speedily, that the sight of those things is an absolute undoubted truth, I having seene the place, and examined circumstances. This is all from

Vol. lxiii.

BY this time I suppose your honour playnely disearnes the back-game, that I mentione formerly was intended to be played. As to the—I will assure you all your proseedings are knowne and noted here to a hares breadth: nay all your preceptions and contrivances of the—are made knowne here to their friends; and I believe gett more breath by travelling such long jurneys, and for returnes carrie with them exhortation or dehortations, as the business is relished. I know not whether the paper be got and brought to my lord's hand as yett, as I tould you was promised in my last to be done. Much rejoyceing amongst—that the second business or question receives so many obstructions; but since that the A. B. are somthing amused, having received a hint of som intended designe to lay them (or most of them) aside. The fere of this makes many of them leade well by the brydle; they now seeming to condesend to those things, that they have bee much averse to; but yett for all that they rejoyce two, when they desearne but the least hopes of a turne to the ould—or somthing like a leaviling business, making only a politique use of all other things, like to the unwriteose mamon, that they may bee received into lasting habitations, if all designes faile them. In a word, Sir, I wish that you may never hav ocation to find, that here is two many cloase-mouthed ones, that resolve never to shew there teeth till they can bit, as they say: but in the meane time it would be a good prevention to file them down to the gumms. As to other newes, we had A.D. 1658. that my lord protector had an expresse, that Copenhagen was taken; but here is not of it since, though it was writ soe by one of the A. B. Yett since wee here by letters from Yorke, that it should bee taken; and som say a Dutch ship hath brought such newes into the—here, but I know not how to credit divers; only I can tell you, that the Dutch starves all the sea-towns, destroyes our numbers of sea-men; that where there was or would bee a thousand, there is not now an hundred: they carrie out all our mony which they dayly receive

And too many farve our enymise for want of imployment. My lord Disborow knowes much of this, to whom I desire to present my cordiall love and most humble farvis, praying your honour to lett him vew these lines, if you have oportunity; and the next I shall direct to him, to prevent too frequent directions to your lordshipp. But I am too long: I crave your honour's pardon, and shall only conclud myself

H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland, to secretary Thurloe.

SIR,

I HAVE too often troubled you with recommending friends to beneficiall favours from his Vol. lxiii. highnesse, although the persons so recommended have been of such meritt, as may P. 271. enable us to give an accompt, even why wee diminish the standing revenue to gratify them; yett I have not till now mett with an opportunity to present unto you a person, who will oblige himself (and who is worth the obliging) at his own charge, and by augmenting his highnes present revenue. Sir Maurice Eustace, an eminent lawyer, hath a lease of 99 years, of certain lands, called Irish-town, Much-house, and Gerald's-town, allowed him by the court of claymes, at the yearly rent of ten pounds. He is willing to encrease his rent unto twelve, soe he may have the fee-term thereof. The proposition is soe faire, that I should but disparage it to say more on its behalfe. Wherefore I desire you to get his highness signature to the inclosed draught of a letter to that purpose. I am beholding to this gentleman, and doe owe him a kindnesse. I wish other men would be so ingenious and modest, as to contrive their gratifications in wayes like this. No more trouble at present from

Your very affectionate

and faithfull servant,

Dublin, 21. March, 1658.

H. CROMWELL.

Sir, I desire your favour to this person, the thing being easie, and as I hope, may be to good purpose.

H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland, to secretary Thurloe.

SIR,

IT is no wonder, that magni conatus should nihil agere, where there are so many Vol. lxiii. actors one against another, what is done being onely the act of that little difference of P. 273. power, whereby the predominant party exceeds the others. My opinion is, that any extreame is more tolerable then returning to Ch. St. Other disasters are temporary, and may bee mended; those not. I know you are of the same opinion. A good price was paid the Hollanders for barreing that interest. Sir An. Morgan tells mee of your care to have the best advice in Lill's busines; which indeed is influentiall upon the government of our army; mutineers now craveing to be tryed at common law, and intend to bring actions battery against their officers, that correct them. I have little to say from hence, things being well enough here as yet: wee must wait as well as the rest of our neighbours for money. I pray God direct all things for the best. I remaine

Your very affectionate and faithfull servant,

Secretary Thurloe to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCYE,

A.D. 1658. SINCE my last I have had the advise of doctor Walker and doctor Turnour, touchinge the souldier, who is condemned by the court martiall; and they are both of oppinion, that it is not safe to execute hym, but that it is much better to deliver hym over to be tryed by lawe. I beleive Sir Antony Morgan will have further advise about it, both of common lawyers and civilians; but I thought it necessary to give your excellency this information in the meane tyme, beinge a matter (as I conceive) of very great consequence.

In the possession of the right honourable the earl of Shelburne.

The parlament hath made one step touchinge the Scotch and Irish members. The last night they voted, that the members returned from Scotland shall continue to sitt in the present parlament; and this morneinge wee enter'd upon the debate of the Irish members, and have proceeded soe farre as to voet, that it shall be noe part of the question, wheither they be legally returned. This difficulty grew upon this; some would have the house goe upon the meere right and lawe in the determination of this question; others would have it a mixt consideration, takeinge in lawe, equity, and prudence: Et si non singula profunt, juncta juvant. Soe that wee hope this of Ireland will have as good fortune as those of Scotland. When this is over, wee shall then returne to our great question of transactinge with the other house. The greatest objection to it is the 1,300,000 l. which cannot be lessened but by consent of the other house. And that they will never give their consent to, because it must take away their pay, most of the house beinge officers. But all is done, which may be, to give satisfaction in that. It is a miracle of mercy, that wee are yet in peace, consideringe what the debates are, and what underhand workeinge there is to disaffect the officers of the army: but for ought I can perceive, they remeyne pretty staunch, though they are in great want of pay, for which noe provision is at all made, nor doe I see that wee are likelie to have any yet.

General Mountagu is at sea with a good fleet, waytinge for a wynde to goe to the Sound; and if it please God to give hym weather, he will be there before the Dutch; and if that be, there are great hopes, that a good peace may be made betweene the Dane and the Swede. There are great discourses of a peace betweene the French and the Spanyards, infoemuch that it is scarce doubted, but that the peace is concluded; and I have this day received a letter from Flanders, assureinge it. But I have it from good hands from Paris, that it is as good as broken of, and that the cardinall is puttinge forth a declaration to shew the grounds of it, and is prepareinge for the next campania very vigorously. MY LORD,

THE last post I gave your lordshipp a true account, how wee then stood. We are advanced very little since. The debate concerning the Scotch members came not to a result till last night: it was carried by many voyces, they should sit with the English this parliament. The Irish, it's conceived, will be this daye's work; but how many more, he must be a very wise man can tell. The bill my last mentioned, brought into the other house, tho' twice read, proceeds no farther. It is confest by all, their never was a freer parliament. If they settle us, the mouths of our bosome enemies will be stopped. 'Tis apparent, how hard they stickle to impeade all; but I hope, God will disapoint all such counsell. I am,

MY LORD,

A.D. 1658. WHEREAS his highness and the council have been informed, that divers ships of war in the river of Thames, and other ports of this nation, are preparing to be set forth under the command of diverse persons, subjects of this commonwealth, pretended to be employed in the service of foreign princes and states, without leave of his highness, or the council; which may be prejudicial to this commonwealth: Ordered by his highness the lord protector and the council, that the commissioners of the customs be and are hereby required and authorized to make inquiry after, and lay an embargo of all such ships in the river of Thames, or elsewhere within the ports of this commonwealth, until his highness and the council shall be satisfied concerning the service, wherein such ships are intended to be employ'd, and give licence therein.

MY LORD,

Vol. lxiii.
p. 279.

I AM sorry to heare your debates are soe longe, and your businesse goes soe slowlie on. I pray God unite your hearts, soe that you may settle things, that may be for his glory, and the peace of the nations. I much wonder they should question the Scotch commissioners to sitt in parliament, being the country is united to England. I am sorry to heare, that any of the Scotch officers should be acting to divide and distract you. I could wish you had written to mee the names of them. I heard of coll. Ashfeild and my lieutenant-colonell; and if there be any more, I shall desire to heare their names, and I shall write to them. If they were heere, these two could signifie but a little, as little as any two officers in Scotland; but I could wish his highnesse would command them away to their commands, which I thinke would bee the best course. As to what they are pleased to say, that the rest of the forces in Scotland are of their opinions, I assure you, that they are much deceived; for there are no forces can be quieter then these are, and shall bee satisfied with any thinge his highnesse and parliament shall settle. And thus much you may be confident of from Dr. Philip Carteret to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

AS your favour to me was at first without desert, soe the continuation thereof hath ^{A.D. 1659.} exceeded my expressions. I had experience of it in my father's troubles, and much more in my owne. My lord, I should be a most ungratefull person, if I should ever forgett your goodnesse in not onely protecting, but alsoe countenancing me, when I was like to be oppressed; and the late favour I have received from his highnesse in being appointed to serve him in England, I must owne to be the fruite of your excellencie's letter on my behalfe to Mr. secretary. It is my grieffe, that I have nothing to returne, but the poore man's part, my humble thanks and acknowledgements of your great favours, humbly begging of your excellencie, that I may still be retained in your thoughts, and honoured with the title of

Your EXCELLENCIE's most humble and faithfull servant,

Colonel Barkstead to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONORABLE,

IN obedience to your commands, I have here inclosed sent you the copies of the warrant of commitment, and the other for the delivery to Mr. Noell for transportation, neither of which being under your hand, col. Gardiner, Rowland Thomas, Somersett Fox, Frauncis Fox, Thomas Saunders, were delivered on board the ship Edward and John of London the last of May, 1655. Colonel Grey and Mr. Jackson being then sicke, were not sent, and afterwards were released by his late highness warrants. Not more, but that I am,

Dr. Thomas Clarges to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

SINCE my last my lord Broghill and some other of your excellencie's friends have had a more serious consultation concerning Lyll, of which his lordship promises me to give your excellency intimation. On fryday last Sir Jerome Zanchey brought a charge into the house of bribery and breach of trust against doctor Petty, to which he set his hand; and amongst other expressions he told us, he knew so well the danger of bringing in a charge of that nature against a member of parliament, that he would not have done it, but in confidence to make it good. Many of the long robe were against the receiving of it, till it was

A.D. 1659. was digested into particulars (for the charge was generall); but at last it was resolved, he should be summoned to attend the house that day month; and I believe Sir Jerome finds the sense of the house so much inclines to particularizing his charge, that he is gone post to Ireland, to enable him to do it; and yesterday morning he began his journey. I humbly beseech your excellency's pardon for inclosing a few lines to the doctor in this letter, which the extraordinariness of the occasion makes me not to doubt of. The speech Sir Jerome made, before he delivered his charge, made the business seeme very great; but when the thing itself was read, it gave but little impression. Mr. Ansly told us, the doctor had bin used to things of this nature; but never yet upon any examination could any thing be fastened on him; and he doubted not, but he would well acquitt himself of this.

Yesterday wee passed a question, that had bin many dayes before the subject of our debates; which was, that this house will transact with the members of the other house as an house of parliament during this present parliament; and that it is not intended hereby to exclude such peers, as have bin faithfull to the parliament, from their priviledge of being duly summoned to be members of that house. At the passing of this vote the affirmatives were 198, and the negatives 125, in which number (to the wonder of many) the knight for Kildare was a negative, and a loud one. This day a bill was brought in, intituled, An act for taking away all lawes, statutes and ordinances concerning excise, and new impost of blank years, and concerning customes, tonage, and poundage, after blank months, after the death of his highness the lord protector. It was read the first time this day, and ordered to be read againe a second time on Thirdsday next.

As I was sealing my letter, the speaker sent the letter of summons of doctor Petty to me, and desired for the better security of it, that I would inclose it in your excellency's packet. I have nothing more at this time, but am,

May it please your EXCELENCY,

Your excellency's most humble servant,

MY LORD,

NOTWITHSTANDING what I did write in my former letter, I cannot but look upon it as my duty to give you an account of the most material proceedings in the affaires of your letter-office here. I have taken such accounts from the severall persons acting therein at my arrivall, as they could give, but have not yet perfected the same with them. On the 25th instant I began to put the office into such a method as I thought fit by virtue of the power your honour was pleased to intrust me with, att which time all persons did desist; but immediately those belonging thereunto were againe admitted, save only I thought fitt to suspend my resolutions as to Mr. Vaughan and captain Talbot, (they being either most obnoxious, or least usefull, and under the greatest fallerys) untill I doe understand the further pleasure of your lordship or your deputye generall in England, to whom I have weekly given a perticular account of all passages, and by whose consent and approbation I am soe soone, as conveniently I can, sending the Munster maile 2 or 3 times a weeke, in hopes it will be to the better advancement of the affaire, and give greater content to the nation.

LE soubigné conseiller du roy d'Espagne, son secretaire, et de son ambassade, aupres de A.D. 1659. messieurs les estats generaux des provinces unies du Pais Bas, a receu ordre de son excellence de seigneur marquis de Caracena, de faire plaintes à LL. SS. de l'insult commis le 6. de ce mois par quelques predicants de Bergopzoom contre les religieux du cloistre de Huybergen, situé notoirement sous la souveraineté du roy son maistre, s'estant non seulement outreue de les troubler dans l'exercice divin, mais tasché de plus par toutes sortes de fineses, et sous pretexte d'en avoir un ordre de LL. SS. (ce qu'ils non pourtant jamais voulu monstrier) de se rendre maistre de l'eglise pour y precher, de quoy n'ayants pu reussir, ils l'auroient fait sur le cimetiere avec grande insolence et menaces de chasser les dits religieux dans peu de jours. Et comme l'on tient pour certain, que cet attentat ne provient que du zele indiscret des dits predicants, qui l'ont entrepris de leur propre chef et autorité, sans aucun ordre de LL. SS. il a charge de son excellence de les prier et requerir (comm' il fait le plus serieusement qu'il peut) de donner au plustost les ordres necessaires à ce que cette violence soit deument reparte, et que les dits predicants ne viennent plus à empescher par semblables nouveautés et troubles sur la jurisdiction de sa majesté, au prejudice de la litispence, qui est devant la chambre mypartie touchant le dit cloistre de Huybergen, en vertu de laquelle toutes voyes de fait doivent cesser. Ce qu'il veut esperer de la prudence et moderation de LL. SS. et qu'elles observerent toute sorte de bon voisinage et correspondance de ceur coste, comme l'on en use de la parte de sa dite majesté. Sur quoy il attend une prompte et favorable resolution de LL. SS. Fait à la Haye, le 11. de Avril, 1659. Signé.

The city of Hamburg to the protector Richard.Serenissime & Celsissime PROTECTOR, Domine Clementissime, POSTEAQUAM nobis à nostro ablegato jam pie defuncto syndico domino Joachimo Peterffen relatum fuit, Scoticum colonellum Patricium Hay deductionem prætensionum suarum in scriptis serenissimæ celsitudinis vestræ domino parenti gloriosissimæ et piæ memoriæ, ut et illustrissimo concilio status, & amplissimo judicio admiralitatis exhibuisse, eique multa documenta in probationem adjunxisse, per prænominatum nostrum syndicum copiam prædictæ deductionis & adjunctorum documentorum instanter rogavimus; & cum præter omnem expectationem ipso vivo petitis nostris delatum non fuerat, per præsentem nostrum ablegatum eandem petitionem ingeminavimus, & tandem prædictam deductionem una cum aliquot documentis a judicio admiralitatis obtinuimus, nobisque copialiter transmissam die 22. Martii accepimus.

Cum autem ex communicata deductione & adjunctis documentis appareat, quod colonellus Hay non tantum de toto senatu nostro, sed & de ejusdem membris, partim viventibus, partim in Christo quiescentibus, virulentas calumnias nunquam probandas perfricta fronte & maledice protulerit, falsisque attestatis corroborare tentaverit:

SIR,

Vol. lxiv.
p. 41.

BEING informed of what passed the other day touching the election at Ryſing at the committee of priviledges, where I conceive I was much detracted by some of colonel Jermy's witnesses and relations, and fearing least I should by my silence thereto acknowledge myselfe guilty of any part of those malicious flanders, is the occasion I now give you the trouble; and much the rather, seeing that by their malicious machinations they seeme to entrench on the honour of no lesse person then his highness the lord protector and the secretary, as it were, inferring their directions underhand for what I did (as they tearme it) goe sinisterly about to effect; the which had it been in the least tittle true, I could have willingly sate downe (both to myselfe and others) with the severest censure of the most rigorous person present at the hearing of the sayd cause, where it was alledged, that I should in publique at Ryſing tell colonel Jermy, and others present with him, that I was, before I came from London, engaged by his highness and the secretary to get colonel John Feilder chosen chosen a burgesse of that place; and also that in a letter, which I wrote to Mr. Goddard A.D. 1659. of Lynne, I therein named and specified as much to him. To the first point of what I spake to colonel Jermy and the rest, I am ready at any time to make oath point-blanke, that the sayd allegations of theirs are false; and I can and will at any time, when I am called, bring several unbyassed persons, who were present all the while that day, when I spake to any of them, who will witness, that there passed not to their hearings, or to their knowledge, the least syllable to that purpose or effect: and I hope in the interim my word will sooner be believed then theirs; for I never was defamed for lying, or recorded for perjury, or suborning thereof. And I hope moreover, it will appear no vanity in me, if I say, I think my simple word at any time ought to go as far in any man's belief as theirs, since that in matters of farr greater moment, and in the whole transaction of the payment of so many scores of thousands of pounds, and all kinds of persons, which I have dealt with, there is not one can say, I ever broke or falsified my word or honour in the least tittle. Next, as to the improbability of their lye, that if such a thing had been true, a man of common sense, that had the least grain of reason about him, should in publick say that to those persons, which then professed themselves his and his businesse's enemys, which immediate after, by their relating it, must of necessity crush and quash himself, and give them all the advantage possible, is a thing so ridiculous in itself, as it needs no other confutation. Wherefore also I omitt many other convincing circumstances, to come to one positive and demonstrable proof, where I shall shew you, how diametrically opposite this lye and invention of theirs is to a plain truth. 'Tis sayd, that in my letter to Mr. Goddard, which I wrote the day before the election, I desired him to desist, for that I was engaged to, and had promised his highness the lord protector and the secretary to choose colonel John Feilder there. Sure, Sir, whosoever it was, which alledged this so confidently in publick before such honourable persons, did forget the old proverb of Oportet mendacem esse memorem; else his memory would have prompted his malice some other way, and framed a more likely story. For Mr. Goddard himself, I doubt not, can and will shew the very letter itself, to whom I pray you write about it; and if there be one word, or the least mention of either of those names, I am content to be censured, and will sit down with the infamy, which I think those, that invented that falsehood, are guilty of; and I will upon those terms willingly change my esteem in the world with theirs; but if not, I hope both I and they shall keep the same characters in that point, as I state them. Now, Sir, besides this, to shew you both at present what I wrote, and why I wrote, I here send you a true copy of the letter, which upon my faith and reputation is verbatim, not adding or diminishing the least syllable, and was then immediately copyed out by me, although I very seldom keep any copy of letters. Wherefore I shall also declare the very occasion to you, why I kept it, which was to shew to Sir William Doyly, to whom I sent it the next day after the election; and he being a very honourable and worthy person, and one you may meet every day in the house, I pray for my justification ask him for it; and I doubt not but he will shew it you, and compare it to this I send; for he very well knows, and so I think yourself doe also, that I was, before I went down to Ryſing, engaged by promise to my lord Hobart, and to him, to use my best endeavours for promoting the election of Mr. Baldock, and Mr. Brag; and after (for some reasons you know) colonel Feilder would not stand at a place, where he else certainly had been chosen, I resolved to endeavour to get him chose at Ryſing; and you know I agreed with, and continued it so by letter with the abovenamed 2 persons, that colonel Feilder should be with their good likeing chose there for one, intending Mr. Baldock, as my letter mentions, for the other. These were the 2 persons of note and eminency, which my letter to Mr. Goddard speaks of, to whom I was engaged; for I do protest, I neither wrote or thought of any other person at that time, which had engaged me, but the abovesaid lord Hobart, and Sir William Doyly; and so it not only appears by the whole story and sequel, but even colonel Jermy himself and his confederates can, if they durst speak truth, also testify, and especially since themselves (whatever they pretend) cannot but remember, that on the very day of election I named to them these 2 persons, viz. the lord Hobart, and Sir William Doyly, which I doubt not also but I shall prove to their faces by persons then present of more credit and unspotted reputation, whose testimonies in a matter not concerning them will, I hope, be sooner believed then colonel Jermy's, or any of his associates in their own case. And besides this, to shew you more clearly, how they of purpose mistake the true state of the case, it is obvious, and I shall prove it even by his witnesses, and the unanimous consent of almost every one of the burgessees, that they generally agreed they would first chuse one, any whomsoever I should recommend; but for the other, they would be left free for Mr. Goddard; whereupon I did then recommend colonel John Feilder, and had their promises and assurances for him; and believing, that in the next place Mr. Goddard only could intervene betwixt Mr. Baldock's choice, little imagining, that colonel Jermy's rents in that country, or the character I heard elsewhere generally given him, had left him in a capacity of being ranked in so honourable company; and thinking myself assured to meet with no other

A.D. 1659. other valuable opposition, whereby Mr. Baldock might be chose, but Mr. Goddard's was occasion I wrote that letter to him, being informed also by Mr. Goddard's friends, that he did not seek it. Wherefore, as it is therein mentioned, it was for Mr. Baldock's sake alone I wrote, who is a person, I believe, never in his life either spake with, or saw his highness or the secretary, or did either of them ever see him, or hear his name; and therefore how upon their accounts I should endeavour to get him chose, I see no coherence; and Mr. Goddard himself, who is a stranger to me, can justify, that I afterwards on the election-day told him as much, I then naming to him my lord Hobart and Sir William Doyly to be the persons, which had engaged me therein. To conclude, as to the whole matter, I know no reason, why I, that have a voyce, and as good a right to choose at Ryfing as any one of the burgeses, should be debarred, or thought ill on, for endeavouring both by my presence and friends to get such persons fairly chose, as I verily believe will do their nation and the country good service; and till I can believe it a crime, I shall not desist from it. Sir, pardon, I pray, the tediousness of this: a charge you know requires a fewer lines than an answer; besides, that when I see you next, I shall be much better able then by paper to express at large all the particulars of the wrong, which herein has been put upon me; and wherein I hope you will study all private and publick occasions to vindicate,

THE present unhappy dissention and warr between your most serene majesty and the king of Denmark, with the evils and inconveniences proceeding or depending thereupon, not only to yourselves and people, but also to your allies and neighbours, being seriously pondered by his most serene highness the lord protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland, he hath found it best to use his utmost perswasion and endeavours towards both your majesties, for the composing of the same; and hath commanded me to sail into these parts with his fleet, and to demean myself as a common friend to you both, contributing what in me lyes to remove those difficulties, that may be in the way of a peace, and secure agreement between you. The which in part (through God's favour) I have performed by my present arrival here. And now, according to my duty, I communicate unto your most serene majesty the commands of my master, earnestly intreating your majesty would be pleased to hearken to his desires, which as a true friend he makes unto you, he judging it your own interest, as well as that of your neighbours and allies, that a speedy end be put to this warr, the continuance whereof cannot but be dangerous to those aforementioned, as also to the whole Protestant interest in Europe. And I take leave to give your majesty assurance, that for my own part, as I account it a happiness to be employed in so acceptable a service, so nothing shall be wanting from me, that may contribute towards the making of a happy compoſure, and testifying the truth of my being

HIS most serene highness the lord protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland, having with great compassion, as well as prudence, considered the unhappy condition of the two crowns of Sweden and Denmark, by reason of the present warr they are involved in, as also the inconveniencies depending thereon to neighbouring states and friends, hath resolved to use his utmost endeavours for reconciling the said two crowns, and commanded me to sail

In pursuance whereof, being arrived in this place, I have communicated to both their majesties my master's commands as abovesaid, desiring that they would hearken to that his so friendly and profitable advice; and that nothing shall be wanting in me, that may contribute thereunto. And now I give your lordship this account, desiring your friendship, correspondence, and assistance, in promoting the peace aforesaid; and that you will not suffer the fleet or fleets under your command to act in hostility against, or give further assistance unto either side, or act in such a way, as may occasion jealousy between England and the United Provinces, whilst these endeavours are on foot. Resolution of the states general.

19. April, 1659. [N. S.]

AFTER deliberation it hath been resolved, that letters shall be written to the extraordinary deputies of this state in Denmark, that their high mightinesses hear from all parts, that the Sweedish men of war take all they meet of the ships of the subjects of Denmark, even in the sight of the ships of war of this state; and that they suffer still since the delivery of the last act of his majesty of Denmark of the 29th past, which was concluded to the content of the ministers of the three states. Wherefore considering the whole matter, their high mightinesses think fit to renew hereby their orders in their letter of the first instant; and in case the peace is not made between the two northern crowns, before the receipt hereof, that they shall put them in execution, it being their meaning, that if the king of Denmark continue to accept the three agreements made at the Hague, although the king of Sweden had consented fully unto them, and that there must be yet some time to end the treaty, that they will endeavour to persuade both parties to desist from all acts of hostility; and if Sweden continue the same, they shall do the same, and protect the subjects of Denmark, till the treaty be concluded; and that it shall serve them for information, that their high mightinesses injoin this in respect of the order, which they sent to colonel Killegrew, who commands the forces in Funen, to cease all acts of hostility: also that their high mightinesses rely upon their zeal and good conduct, and refer themselves to their wisdoms and necessary precautions.

Mr. Thomas Herbert, clerk of the council of Ireland, to secretary Thurloe.

SIR,

THE lord lieutenant and council have received two letters from his highness, both intimating his pleasure to have 4000 l. debt satisfied to Sir Robert Collingwood; the latter of them condescending to the expedient, which their lordships humbly offered in answer to the first; that is, to have the same satisfied rather by lands in the barony of Beere and Bantry, then by houses in the towne of Tredagh. Their lordships are not unsatisfied to putt in execution what is desired; but they desire the warrants from his highness concerning these matters to come under his proper seale, and with such testes as are usual. To which purpose they have commanded mee to send you the enclosed, that in case it be not, as it ought to be, you would bee pleased to make it so, and doe what else you thinke necessary for their lordships justification in this grant. Mr. John Barwick to king Charles II.

May it please your MAJESTY,

A.D. 1659. YOUR gracious acceptance of my former letters hath tempted me again to this boldness of an immediat address, being desired by a friend at this time to put 500 l. into such a way, as may, by the blessing of God, bring it safely to your majestie's hand. I perceive your majesty hath already been made acquainted with it, and whence it comes; so that I shall not need to trouble your majesty any further about it, then only to signify, that now at last half of it is upon the way, the bills being sent by the last post, and the rest will follow next week, if God permitt. I thank God, there is no part of the delay chargeable upon my account (no more then in the former); for the bills were sent the first post after I was made acquainted with it. But there is one thing in the manner of the return, wherein I must humbly cast myself upon your majestie's pardon; and that is, that these bills are consigned, as the former were, and not made payable to Jaques de la Hay, as your majesty directed. And the reason of it is, because Mr. Gregson was afraid to stand in the bills as correspondent to a person, whom he knew not; nor did I know any other merchant, whom I could safely trust, that would pass the bills in his name, and appear in the business, in case any delay or danger should intervene, as it fell out (to my great grief and his too) in the last bill Mr. Gregson sent. Concerning which business, he assures mee, he could neither possibly foresee the danger, before it came, nor doe more in it now it is fallen out, then he both hath and will doe. And he puts me still in hopes, that he shall be able to doe good in it, though not without some delay and loss. I have written to the person, to whom the bills are sent, to assigne them to any other your majesty shall be pleased to make choyce of, in case your majesty should dislike what I have done; and that was the nearest I could possibly come to your majestie's instructions for the present in this particular. I am very confident, your majesty is so graciously sensible of what hazzards they run, who are interested in matters of this nature, as to permitt them, as much as may be, to use their own method in the way of performing your majesty's service, provided the worke be done; which made me rather presume upon your majestie's pardon at this time, then press any other method upon them then what seemes best to them. For your condition is so ticklish, as we dare hardly give any occasion of distrust to any man, that hath been counscious to any of our other services performed to your majesty; and yet I hope and beleive, I deale with such persons, as may safely be trusted in this particular. I pray God send better times, and in the interim, and ever, preserve your sacred majesty, and all those, who out of conscience perform their duty to God and your majesty; among whom I humbly begg the favour your majesty would be pleased to repute him, who is behind none in that particular,

Your MAJESTIE's ever obliged subject, in all duty and service.

Indorsed, For his sacred majesty.

Mr. John Barwick to Sir Edward Hyde.

MY LORD,

THE 4th instant I received your lordship's of 19th past, and shall be allwayes very willing and ready to serve his majesty and your lordship in what lyes in my power. But my health has been so bad of late yeares, as forces me sometimes to a better aire. And besides that, having 2 friends bound with me in a very heavy bond, makes me the more cautious in sending or receiving letters, unless it be in this more privat and safe way.

In the possession of Joseph Radcliffe, of the Inner Temple, esq;

I am very much troubled at the delay in receiving those goods I formerly sent, and so is that friend, who assisted me in it. And that your lordship may make the better enquire into the matter, I have here inclosed a note of the particular bills, dates, and persons, as I had it from the merchants. I hope all things will be well in time. I know nothing that needs explication in it, but that one of the 100 l. charged on Mr. Cooper was paid to Mr. Thornton, and of that his majesty hath already acknowledged the receipt. I have given his majesty the best account I can at present of the last 200 paid to Mr. Duckett. My friend here will doe what may be done in it. This morning I have putt into his hand 500 more. The bills for half of it were sent by the post last night, and the next will be returned by the next post. It is a parcell, which I understand hath been long promised, infomuch as I hear your lordship hath heretofore written to quicken it, so that I shall leave your lordship to conjecture the person, whence it comes. The bills are sent, as the former were, upon the reasons expressed in the inclosed.

Our

Our sick friend is, I hope, in the way of perfect recovery. This week he hath been ^{A.D. 1659.} abroad every day more or less. He presents his humble service and thanks to your lordship, and (by your lordship's intercession) his humble duty to his majesty. And the like command I have also from the person, of whos hand I received the book, concerning whom your lordship's conjecture was very right. He will send the author to me next week, (for then he will be in town) to try him myself first; and if that will not doe, he will then make use of the way with him, which your lordship prescribes.

At this time I shall not need to trouble your lordship with any narrative of our present affaires. There comes one over at this time, whos ey sees further into them then myne can; and whos tongue can better expresse them then my pen, especially at this time, being just upon a litle journey upon some speciall business that concerns a friend; so that what I write so long before, may perhaps be contradicted before the shipp putts off. The moderat party (as they are called) were so jealous of the starting up of a commonwealth, as they joined with the Whitehall men in bringing in not only the Scotch and Irish members, but the other house also. But when they came to matter of money, (by the continuance of taxes, excise, &c.) they fell from their former zeall, so as the protector hath no great confidence in them. Some of them begin to see already they have overshot themselves; for things being brought to the management of 2 houses, hath (as is conceived) imboldened the army to that petition, (which I doubt not but your lordship will see) as hoping they may make their party good in one of the houses, and not fearing to be voted down by either of them apart, now that both must concurr in things of that nature. I cannot learn, what number of persons (especially of the Scotch and Irish army) concurred in it; but some say, the parliament think not of it as a matter of so much weight as themselves think of it. If I be not mistaken, (which God knows I may easily be) it was intended by them as a foundation whereupon to proceed, in giving lawes to both houses, according to former precedents of themselves, or to purge them, till they comply with their designs.

The fleet is gone 10 dayes agoe. The Spanish merchants have petitioned against their own trade. The petition is now in print; and instructions are given to bring in a bill concerning that business.

I know this is superfluous at this time, and therefore I may the better presume of your lordship's pardon for this tumultuary hast. Perhaps I may return before the shipp goes off; but I durst not trust to it. Your lordship, by this gentleman, that now comes, will truly understand my condition in every particular: when that is known, I shall very readily obey your lordship's commands in what you shall think convenient to putt upon him, who much honours your lordship, though unknown.

London, April 9.
1659.

Your LORDSHIP's most humble servant.

Indorsed, These for my L. C^r.

Mr. John Durie to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONORABLE,

TO satisfie the desire of some friends, I have suggested that, which is here put to paper, Vol. lxiv. concerning the parliament's consulting about matters of religion, which I think my P. 31. dutie to acquaint you withall; that, if this way may bee practicable by God's blessing, the divided parties may come to understand one another better then hitherto they have done.

I have also added herewith a copie of the petition, which I have drawn up to bee presented to the grand committee for religion; for the furtherance of which I humbly intreat your favour and assistance, that I may not hitherto loose any more time then hitherto I have done, who am

Your HONOR's most humble servant in Christ,

St. James's House,
9th of April, 659.

JOHN DURIE.

To the right honorable the knights, citizens, and burgessees, in parliament assembled,

The humble petition of John Durie, minister.

Sheweth,

A.D. 1659. THAT your petitioner, having been long ago countenanced and encouraged by the chief divines and magistrates of all the Protestant churches, as well reformed in these parts and abroad, as Lutheranes, to solicit and to negotiate the means and ways of gospel peace and unity amongst them, hath for many years continued in that negotiation, which now, by the blessing of God, is come to some maturitie upon the grounds laid in the memorable long parliament, unto which all the churches abroad have had a special respect:

Vol. lxxiv. p. 33.

Upon the recommendation, which his late highness the lord protector gave unto your petitioner's negotiation with the churches beyond the seas:

Upon the declaration, which both the universities of this nation, together with the chief ministers of London, gave as a testimony of their concurrence with your petitioner in his work.

Upon all which grounds the churches abroad, and their universities, under the authority of their magistrates, having settled a way of correspondency in this gospel worke with us, and your petitioner having thoroughly informed his late highness, and the last parliament, of the progresse of so blessed a designe, the parliament did by a special vote recommend the encouragement and advancement of the worke unto his said highness, and his said highness was pleased to recommend it to the serious consideration of the divines, who met at Whitehall for approving of ministers; since which time your petitioner hath proceeded further to treat with the churches, and chiefly with the associations of the churches of this nation, and with the universities, and with the churches in New England, who are all engaged to co-operate therein in a religious correspondency with your petitioner, to further it in a gospel way, expecting and desiring, that from your honour's authority, and pious zeale, some countenance and assistance may accrew unto their willing and religious undertakings.

In consideration of all which, your petitioner doth humbly pray, that you would be pleased to appoint some of your members to look into and examine the truth and particulars of the premisses; that having made a report thereof, your wisdom and godly zeale may be able to consider what countenance and furtherance this most honourable parliament should, for the glory of God, and the good of his churches, give unto soe good a work.

And your petitioner shall pray, &c.

JOHN DURIE.

Concerning the parliament's consulting about matters of religion.

Vol. lxxiv. p. 37. IF we consider the parliament, as the supreme senate of the nation, being the heads of the tribes of our Israel, and representing the whole as a people in the way of Christianity, intending to manifest unto the world their profession, and to advance the unity of the spirit amongst the members of the nation in that, whereunto they have attained (which, I conceive, should be their aime); then the way, by which they ought to do this, should be such as becometh Christians; that is, it should be suitable to the spirit of Christ in propagating the truth of the gospel.

But how to follow this way, or rather first find it out, is perhaps not much minded, nor sought after by many; or if sought after, yet so variously apprehended, that it is not unanimously found, and so cannot be followed: because in seeking and following after it, for so far as it is known, there is oftentimes a mixture of different interests, which makes the use of that knowledge ineffectual. However, let me without partiality suggest that, which happily may help to facilitate a more full discovery thereof; which I shall endeavour, by laying down some maxims, containing the undoubted way of Christianity free from all human interests, and by shewing some course of proceeding, wherein that way may be followed, to gain the forenamed ends.

I. The maxims.

Supposing the parliament's aime to bee, to propagate the truth of the gospel in a way futable to the spirit of Christ; the properties of the spirit of Christ, and of the truth of the gospel, and of the propagating thereof, are to be reflected upon; which are these:

1. The spirit of Christ doth not propagate the truth of the gospel by the command-ments of men imposed magistratically upon the conscience of professors, but by the manifestation of the truth unto the understanding conscience. Mat. xv. 9. 2 Cor. iv. 2.
2. The spirit of Christ doth not strive, nor cry, nor lift up his voice in the streets tumultuously to propagate the gospel; but is gentle to all men, apt to teach, patient, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves; and bearing with the bruised reed, and smokeing flaxe, it doth bring forth judgment unto victory. Matt. xii. 19, 20. 2 Tim. ii. 24, 25.
3. The spirit of Christ is a spirit of illumination, to manifest the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Ephes. v. 8. 13.
4. The spirit of Christ is a spirit of liberty, and doth call the saints in liberty, (without giving occasion to the flesh) to serve one another through love. 2 Cor. iv. 6. 2 Cor. iii. 17.
5. The truth of the gospel is propagated, when without murmurings and disputeings, with a blameless conversation the word of life is held forth unto the world. Gal. v. 13. Phil. ii. 15, 16.
6. The word of life is the law, and the testimony, containing the promises and the rules of life, which manifest the good works, which God hath ordained, that we should walk therein. Isai. viii. 20. Prov. vii. 2. Eph. 2. 10.
7. This law and testimony is revealed in the scriptures, which are given by inspiration of God, for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, and throughly furnished unto all good works, and which contain the form of doctrine to be received, and the form of sound words to be held fast by the professors of the truth. 2 Tim. iii. 16, 17. Rom. vi. 17. 2 Tim. i. 13.
8. The spirit of Christ doth propagate the truth of the gospel by love, in unity of the spirit of faith, and the bond of peace. 1 Cor. viii. 1. Eph. iv. 3, 13.
9. The unity of the spirit is maintained amongst the professors of the name of Christ, when the whole body being fitly joined together under the head Christ, and compacted within itself, by that which every joynt supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, doth make the increase of the body unto the edifying of itself. Ephes. iv. 16.
10. If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine, which is according to godliness, he is proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions, and strife of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings, perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness, from which we ought to withdraw ourselves. 1 Tim. vi. 3, 4, 5.

Whence followeth.

1. Whatsoever contradicteth these maxims is contrary to the gospel, and a cause of our confusion.
2. Whatsoever varieth from these maxims doth obstruct the propagating of the truth.

II. The use of these maxims.

It is not enough to know the means to bee used; but the manner of proceeding in the use of them is that, which will gain the end to which they are ordained: nor is it enough to have some general rules, whereby to direct an action, but the manner of applying these rules unto the subject matter in hand is that, which will produce the effect.

Therefore we must consider;

1. The effect intended, or to be intended, what properly it is.
2. The subjects or persons, upon which that effect is to be wrought, how capable they are thereof.
3. The actions and the manner of producing them, by which that effect is to be wrought upon these subjects.
4. The reasons demonstrating, that such actions so produced and applied to capable subjects, will bring forth such an effect.

1. Of the effect.

The effect to be intended is to hold forth a testimony of the national profession of Christianity, and to advance thereby the unity of the spirit amongst the professors. Now if it be askt, What is meant by a national profession of Christianity, what by a testimony thereof, and what by the unity of the spirit to be advanced thereby?

A.D. 1659.

The answer may be to this effect:

The national profession of Christianity is the general owning of Jesus Christ by a people to be the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, the promised Messiah, the King, Priest, Prophet, to whom faith and obedience is due, and without the yielding of which unto him no man can be saved.

Ofal. ex. 3. The testimony of this owning of him must be a voluntary act of the professors of the 2 Cor. viii. 3. nation, evidencing, that as Christ is the king and witness of the truth, so they hear his
Joh. xviii. 37. voice, and assenting thereunto, yeeld the obedience of faith by a professed subjection of 2 Cor. ix. 13. themselves unto him. And because his voice is nowhere heard certainly but in the scriptures, therefore the clearest testimony of our assent unto his voice is to hold forth a confession of our faith and obedience in such scripture words, wherein the maine truths of doctrine and duties necessary for salvation are contained in literal sense.

Matt. xxiii. The unity of the spirit to be advanced amongst professors by such a confession, 8, 10. is to oblige them in regard of it to own one another as Christians, that is, as disciples
Gal. vi. 10. and servants of Jesus Christ, belonging to his family, walking by one and the Phil. iii. 16. same rules of love, of holiness, and mutual forbearance, and consequently building up one Ephes. iv. 1, another in their most holy faith and hope, praying together in the Holy Ghost, striving 2, 3. together for the faith of the gospel, not forsaking the assembling of themselves together,
Jud. 20. and distributing to the necessities of faints.
Phil. i. 27.
Hebr. x. 25.
Rom. xii. 13.

2. Of the persons capable of these effects.

The subjects capable of these effects are all intelligent Christians, who are willing to declare their professed subjection to the gospel. Now by intelligent christians are meant such as know what they do believe, and whereof they practise dutys, that is to say, who know this not so much by hearsay, as by the discerning of God's will in the testimony thereof, and the approving of it in their conscience, so that they can give a reason of the faith and hope, that is in them.

And by a professed subjection to the gospel is meant such a giving up of one's self unto the Lord, as to depend upon the ministry and ordinances of the gospel for a blessing according to the will of God.

Whence this conclusion is to be referred.

That persons, who know not what they believe and practise, but only by hearsay, and have not given themselves up unto the Lord by the ministry and ordinances of the gospel according to his will, are not capable of these effects.

3. Of the actions by which these effects are to be wrought upon capable subjects, and of the manner of producing those actions.

2 Tim. ii. 22. The actions, by which those effects of a national profession may be and wrought upon these persons, are to recommend unto them the duty of holding forth their testimony, and to perswade, exhort and require them to do it in love to the truth, that it may appear, that they are children of the truth, and walk therein, following righteousness, faith, charity and peace with all them that call on the Lord with a pure heart.

And the manner of producing those actions to work the effects intended may be this, that the committee for religion should invite all partys of professors in the nation to present unto them their confessions of faith, and rules of practice, which they acknowledge to be clearly set forth in the letter of the scripture concerning the matters of saving doctrine, of worship, of government, and discipline, to avoid scandals, and of mutual forbearance in differences, which are not fundamentall.

These confessions of the parties, being brought in, and presented to the committee, should be put into the hands of a sub-committee to gather all the doctrines, and rules, wherein all the parties fully agree, into one body of a confession.

This confession should be presented to the parliament, that by it it should be owned in the name of the nation, and made as a publick testimony of our union in the maine and saving truths of God, and of our moderation towards those that differ in lesser matters.

4. Of the reasons demonstrating, that these actions so produced and applied to capable subjects will produce the effects intended thereby.

These reasons may easily be gathered from the maxims laid down in the beginning, and may largely be deduced and pressed upon the consciences, as well of the professors, as of those that are in authority to perswade them to follow this way to heale our breaches; but because it is conceived, that the course, which is here offered, is without all exception free from partiality, and easily to be practised, and none who is godly wise will be averse from it; therefore therefore the reasons shall be spared, till it appear, how the bare motion, as here it is plainly A.D. 1659⁹ offered, will be resented; and hereunto let all of us beseech the Lord to grant a blessing. Amen.

H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland, to secretary Thurloc.

SIR,

I HAVE heretofore told you my thoughts of Dr. Petty, and am still of the same opinion; and if Sir Hierom Sankey doe not run him down with numbers and noise of adventurers, and such other like concerned persons, I beleive the parliament will finde him, as I have represented him. Hee has curiously deluded mee these foure yeares, if he be a knave. I am sure the juntoes of them, who are most busie, are not men of the quiettest temper. I doe not expect you will have leizure, or see cause, to appeare much for him. Wherefore this is onely to let you understand my present thoughts of him. The activenes of Robert Reynolds, and others in this busines, shews, that Petty is not the only marke aimed at: but God's will be done in all things.

Pray let not the busines of my comeing over wholly dye, though it slumber for a while. It would be for the conveniency of my own affaires to know, whether it be probable, I may make a step over this summer. As for things here, I referr you to the bearer for an accompt of them, and remane

Your very affectionate and humble servant,

April 11. 1659.

H. CROMWELL.

General Montagu to secretary Thurloc.

MY LORD,

SINCE my letter by the messenger, who was on board when I set sail, I adventured two more unto you by vessels, which I met at sea, only to let you understand, how we past on in our voyage. After them we proceeded and made the Naze of Norway on friday morning the first instant, and on monday morning the Scaw, and on wednesday in the afternoon, through God's goodness, we arrived here. When I came at the Scaw, by what I could learn from the Juts fishermen, and from an English vessel bound from Lubicke to London, I supposed, that I was before the Dutch fleet; which being one case of my twelve instructions, I thought it best to leave a small frigate there to descry there fleet, when they come, and to deliver the admiral a letter from me, a copy whereof is here inclosed. And lest the fleet should pass by there, and miss him, I appointed another small frigate to lye between the Anout island and the coast of Norway, with the like letter and order; and have given the same direction to the vice-admiral's squadron, who lyeing att anchor between the two castles, had the care of the entrance into the Sound between the Lapp and Coll, my own squadron lying before the town and castle of Elfsingnare, having regard to the passage between Ween island and Schonen, the reere-admiral's squadron a little to the Southward of me having regard to the passage between Ween and Zeland. Before I came in, I sent to the king of Swedeland, that our mutual salutes might be with little expence of powder; which he liked well off, and accordingly I saluted him with twenty-two gunns out of this ship only, the vice and reere-admiral proportionably; and the castle answered us with all their gunns twice round.

I sent for Sir Phillip Meadoes and Mr. Ewers, who came on board on me, soon after I was at anchor; and enquired of them the present state of affairs here; gave Sir Phillip Meadoes your pacquett, and communicated our business together. Next morning I sent the king of Sweden my credential letter, and in the afternoone Sir Philip Meadoes being here on board, we began our business, which stands thus. Both he and Mr. Ewers agree in signifying to me, that there is at present no treaty of peace on foot between the two crowns, nor likelihood of any spontaneous agreement between them; but on the contrary an utter aversion thereunto. The condition of their forces, I hope, Sir Philip Meadoes by his own letters will more punctually relate unto you; but, as well as I remember, is thus: The king of Sweden hath in Zeland three thousand foot, and about three or four thousand horse. In Funen he hath the like number of horse, and some foot in Langland. He hath also some forces and some few at Frederix-ode; the large works thereof are slighted, and a small force only kept. He hath thirty ships of warr at sea, ten whereof went lately out with general Wrangle, upon a design to take in Laland. They in Copenhagen knowing, that the rest of the fleet in Landscroone were not ready to second them, sent out thirteen ships after them, and fell upon them, took one ship, and stranded another upon the

A.D. 1659. the shore. General Wrangle with the rest is gone to Foborch in Funen. Since that time twenty ships are gone out of Lanscroone towards those parts, and some action is expected to be between them and those of Copenhagen. The duke of Brandenburge, as the king of Sweden says, hath not above five thousand foot, but a great body of horse.

Finding it thus, and the new fleet, prepared in Holland, not arrived here, in pursuance of my second instruction, I wrote a letter to the king of Sweden by Sir Philip Meadoes, (which is here inclosed) desiring him to second the same, with imparting unto him the particular terms of the mediation, which he hath done; and he sends me word, that the king of Sweden as yet expresses a great dislike to any treaty with the king of Denmark; and yet more, that the Roschild treaty should be the terms thereof; and upon occasion of a pass I desired from him, for a vessel to go into Copenhagen, (because he pretends to besiege it) he sent by Sir Ph. Meadoes, intreating me to have a care, that in my letter to the king of Denmark there might be no passage prejudicial to the interest of Sweden.

The eighth instant in the morning, I sent Mr. Isaac Ewers, and two or three officers of the fleet, to Copenhagen, with a letter to the king of Denmark, the same as I sent to the king of Sweden, the name only changed, (my credential letter also to him) and a letter to the Dutch admiral Opdam, a copy whereof is herewith sent, and, I hope, will not be disproved; for altho' I had no particular instruction requiring it, yet I judged it convenient, in respect of that general command I have, to manage things with a good correspondence with the forces and ministers of the States General in these parts, where, by the way, you may be informed, that there is no civil minister either of the Dutch or French.

The same eighth instant at night, I received a letter from Sir Ph. Meadoes, purporting, that his majesty of Sweden was grown into better humour; and that considering it was the advice of so good a friend as his highness, he would not shew himself averse to the tender of peace. But before he could declare himself any further, he desired first to know, what the intentions are of his majesty of Denmark, and that with all possible speed, that he may timely take his measures accordingly: concerning which I have advised Sir Philip Meadoes to know the mind of his majesty of Sweden clearly and plainly, to the treaty of Roschild, without relation to the resolution of the king of Denmark, and not give him the advantage to say, he is willing, when he is not, merely to involve us in an assistance, after he hath heard the king of Denmark is unwilling thereunto.

The tenth instant Mr. Ewers, and the captains I sent with him, returned to me from Copenhagen, and brought me the inclosed letter from the king of Denmark; but none from the Dutch admiral, who used them very civilly, as also did the king, but excused his not sending, upon the account of haste, promising to write very speedily to me. By the way, you may take notice, that some of our people, going to visit the lord Opdam after his receipt of my letter, found in company with him the emperor's, the Spanish, and the Polish ambassadors. They brought word also, that the admiral had received news of the fleet from Holland being arrived on this side the Scaw; but we hear, have no other intelligence thereof. This morning the eleventh instant, I sent for Sir Philip Meadoes to come on board, to advise together, how to proceed upon this letter from the king of Denmark; and have resolved not to conclude the king of Denmark by this first kind of denial, but that Sir Philip Meadoes should write unto him, according to the direction of my third instruction, and myself also, which we have done, and sent them to Copenhagen by Mr. Ewers, expecting a very speedy account thereof. A copy of my letter is herewith sent; and, I hope, Sir Philip Meadoes gives you a particular account of the matters he transacts. The same day Monsr. Barkman came to me from the king, to give me notice of six men of warr newly gone out of Copenhagen, to endeavour to join with the rest, that are at Flensburg; and that his majesty hath sent orders to general Bielkensteine to meet them with ten ships, and fight them.

April 11. 1659.

I BEGG your pardon, the rest is not my own hand; for I have beene forced to favour myselfe, in regard of a little distemper this cold climate hath putt mee into. The matters of fact are truly stated to you above, and what more to add I know not, our matters here workinge towards an issue, before we can heare from you againe: else I should have mentioned that clause in the treatye of assistance with Sweden, which Mr. Meddowes saies the king of Sweden will never agree to, viz. That of excludinge out of the Sound the enimies of either confederates, which he cannot doe, unlesse the trade of Dantzick and the whole Baltique were assured to be taken off his hands by the English; besides the drawing his dominions into a perpetuall warr with Holland (for it is supposed wee shall not longe remaine freinds). Thus I forbear your further trouble, and remaine,

My LORD,

Your lordship's most faithfull

and humble servant,

MR. Tirrill reports from the grand committee for grievances and courts of justice the state of the case of Dame Mary Hatton, and others, executors of Sir Thomas Hatton knight and baronet, deceased, of Samuel Dorman citizen and merchant taylor of London, and of John Tarry, servant to Laurence Manly, late of Holdenby in the county of Northampton, deceased, upon their severall petitions exhibited unto the said committee, and examined by them, together with their opinion upon the same. The report brought in from the committee was read, and was as followeth; viz.

Sir Thomas Hatton, being possessed of a lease for years yet enduring of the demesne of the manor of Holdenby in the county of Northampton, at the rent of 180 l. 15 s. 10 d. per annum, by demise of the late queen, did let part thereof to Laurence Manly, for years not yet expired, for the rent of 264 l. per annum, whereof 201 l. being in arrear in anno 1657. Sir Thomas obtains a judgment against Robert Manly, executor of Laurence, whose sheep were taken in execution by the sheriff.

At the time of that execution, there was a year's rent more due by Robert Manly; for non-payment whereof a re-entry was made by the lady and others, executors in trust to Sir Thomas Hatton, for the benefit of his children; and the cattle, that were upon the land, were distrained damage feisant.

John Tarry, shepherd to Laurence Manly, who having three sons, viz. Laurence, John, and the said Robert, which Robert, as was alledged, was executor in trust for John the son, and others, legatees and creditors; this shepherd was sent by Laurence and John the sons, to the market, to sell 150 of the stock, which he sold for 137 l.

Samuel Dorman, being bound as surety for Robert Manly in 1100 l. this Robert Manly assigned the said lease to Dorman, and makes him a bill of sale of the goods and stock upon the ground, and Dorman was in possession.

Robert Manly, about April last, becomes a delinquent, and fled.

Major general Boteler (within two days after that Robert Manly was fled) causeth divers soldiers, under his command, to enter upon the land, and all the cattle upon the ground; resists the sheriff from doing execution, turns Sir Thomas Hatton out of possession, and seizes the cattle, which they had distrained, and were in the custody of the law; imprisons Tarry, and detains him four days in custody, till he confessed, where the money was he sold the sheep for; and cornet Tibbutt agreed with the said Tarry, that it should be brought and left with captain Baynes, which when he had brought 126 l. thereof accordingly, the said cornet Tibbutt, and others of his soldiers, took it away by force, out of the said captain Baynes's house; all which proceedings the said major-general Boteler justified before the committee, by colour of his late highness's letter, commanding him so to do.

The opinion of the committee is, that the entry and detainer of the possession of the lands and goods by force, and rescuing the goods from the sheriff, and hindering execution, and taking the goods, which were distrained, and seizing the money from Tarry, and imprisonment of his person, were unjust and illegal.

And that the said force still continued by major-general Boteler upon the possession of the said lands and stock be removed, and the money and stock with the increase and proceeds thereof restored and delivered to the persons, from whom they were taken.

Resolved,

That this house doth agree with the committee, that the entry and detainer of the afore-said lands and goods by force, and rescuing the goods from the sheriff, and hindering execution, and taking the goods, which were distrained, and seizing the money from Tarry, and imprisonment of his person, were unjust and illegal; and that the said force still continued by major-general Boteler upon the possession of the said lands and stock be removed, and the money and stock, with the increase and proceeds thereof, restored and delivered to the persons, from whom they were taken.

P. 9.

ALTHOUGH your weighty and great employment will not give leave to acknowledge the receipt of mine, I conceive it is my obligation to give you an account of my proceeding, that so that part of it, that may be worth his highness's knowledge, may be imparted to him, even where my last ended, which was from the island of Aryes, from which port bending my course Westward, in five days made Cape Martin, from which place keeping the Spanish coast aboard, I plied to the Streights-mouth; in all which way, met with nothing but four small boats, which the men ran on shore, and left. On the sixteenth of February, I met in the Streights-mouth with the Taunton, returned from Argeir with the copy of their peremptory letter written his highness, about the Turks taken in the Angel, by which I judged it unnecessary to act any further with them, until I know his highness's answer to their letter, and what he should command me therein. So from thence I proceeded unto Cadiz, with no little hope to have met with the galleons, or any part of them, that I might have taken something to answer his great charge in this squadron, dispatching the Malaga to Tetuan to the consul, to provide me one hundred and fifty head of cattle, and twenty thousand of bread, which he did, and enabled me to keep that station twenty-seven days; in all which time met with nothing, but understood the little hopes of galleons until April. The duke of Modena Celi, captain-general of Andalusia, being in no small care upon our appearance, procured young Tromp to come out and see who we were, and how many. I very well knew on what errand he came, and returned him no great gainer by the voyage. My victuals not permitting my longer stay, I went for Tetuan, and took in what was provided for me, and departed thence; and the seventeenth of March stood close into Malaga-road, to discover what men of war were there. Finding but one, and he close aboard the shore, by which it was judged, if we should attempt him, might, in all probability, receive more damage than his destruction might import, we stood away to the Eastward, where we met with a boat of fifteen hundred searves of fruit, out of which we took out seven hundred searves; but a storm arose, we lost the rest and boat, having much ado to save our people. The storm separated us during two days. The Taunton being still with me, we still plied to the Eastward, and after four days the Fairfax came to me, finding me in chace of three ships, which proved English. I spared them the Taunton to secure them through the Streights-mouth; there lying at Gibraltar two Majorcans, the one of thirty, and the other of twenty-two guns, who see all that pass by that side; and they of Ceuta, on the other, advise them either by smoak or firing of guns, who passeth, and how many, as I experimented at my passing in and out; otherwise had given your honour a better account of them, than now I do. And indeed, all our diligence is rendered fruitless by their watch-towers and vigilancy in them. Off Cape-pall, myself and Fairfax met the commander John Omes, being he that baffled captain Whetston of his prize: he had eight ships in his convoy, whom we searched on, richly laden from Leghorn to Cadiz, but all the goods in Dutch, Florentines, and Genoese names; nor can we expect other, or hope for prize, but what is navigated by Spaniards themselves. Two days after met four more, laden from Majorca with oil for their own accounts. The next day being close on board that island, five Moors, slaves to the Spaniards, came off to us in a small boat.

The next day met with a settee, bound into Majorca from Barcelona, with fifty-two Spaniards upon her, and empty cask to load oil. Before were masters of her, carried her masts by the board; but made a shift to tow her hither, being unwilling to lose any thing, that may make money, be it never so little. As the noise of the guns shot at the settee, came to leeward to us, the Phoenix, Tyger, Dover, and Malaga, being but a little a-head plying hither. In the settee, found a letter of the marquis of Mortarra, being governor of all the province of Catalonia. It is directed to the vice-king of Sardinia, and seems to me worth your honour's perusing; so I have sent you both original and translation. The different face, wherewith I am treated now from my last, makes me jealous these people have already embraced the Spanish interest, and do seek occasions to weary us off their port, having not only embarked a good part of the Santa Maria's goods for tenths of what I sold last year at Marseilles, at which time they never demanded any thing: they have likewise seized the boat and goods, I took off the isles of Aries, in which some that have been perishable, have been thrown away, and not a penny suffered to be made of them; and this is now near four months time, and no redress, nor so much as hopes of any. This hath put me to a great plunge for money, and the rather, because the credit the commissioners of the admiralty have given me, proves useless, by the reason of the difficulty found in recovering my bills, which are unpaid to this day. I have in a former sent your honour a copy of a proclamation, the lieutenant of the admiralty proclaimed in the time I lay sick ashore; the substance of which was, that I should depart the harbour, and not sell any prize goods here. This was remedied by the king, upon my dispatch to the cardinal, and the party had a check for his pains; but it seemes, so slightly, that he hath been emboldened to give us further trouble, to the infinite disreputation of his highness and his servants, that so petty a fellow shall dare to injure him, and that without redress. A copy of the order, by which he acts, goes enclosed. If there be not a way thought of to procure a port in this seas of our own, the Squadron will not be very secure, our interest being so small in these people. I shall have little quiet, whilst I am under command of their guns.

Inclosed goeth an original and translate of a paper making appear, what I have often intimated to your honour, viz. that all our friends in amity lend their names to the Spaniard, to protect that little trade they have, and keep it from falling into our hands; so that there is little hope of getting any thing to help charge. Being all at present worth your honour's notice, I subscribe,

Your honor's most humble, and most affectionate servant,

Secretary Thurloe to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCYE,

I Am not wise enough to understand the present condition of our affaires here. Wee spend much tyme in great matters, but very little progresse therein. Some steps are taken towards a comunication with the other house, but they are very imperfect ones, and such as are not, for ought I see, likelye to bringe us together: yet some tyme of late hath been spent upon consideration of the publique revennew, and of the present debt the nation is in, which is great. And I beleeeve your excellencye findes in your affaires of Ireland very great need to have some part of the debt payed, which I thinke there is no great inclynation to, untill a very considerable retrenchment be made in the yearly charge.
It is thought here, that Ireland may be made to bear its owne burden; and that the 8000 l. per mensem may after a little tyme be withdrawen, especially if the soldiers arreares could be satisfied in the first place; but your excellencye is the best judge, what is practicable in this case. I suppose your excellency will have an account from the souldiers of Ireland of the addresse lately presented to his highnes by the army, in respect that the addresse was signed by most of the officers of the Irish army. It is here varioulye interpreted, and very great effects are expected from it, and from the further meeting of the officers of the army, who, upon thursday next, intend further conferences amongst themselves. These tymes, and the affaires transacted in them, give motion to all sorts of humours in the nation; but I trust God will give a good issue to all. The great thinge, which at present enterteynes all the world, is the peace betweene France and Spayne. It is sayd and beleeeved almost every-where, that it is concluded; but I am sure, that it is not true: but yet it's certeyne, it is in very great forwardnes, and more then probable, that it will be soone finished.

There are three points, wherein the treatye cheifly consists: 1. The restitution of the conquests, which is upon the matter agreed. France is to restore all they have in Flanders, Italy, and Catalonia, sans Roussillon and its dependants, and Arras, Thionville. The 2^d is the restauration of the duke of Lorraine and his cuntryes, except Verdune, Thou, Stenny,

A.D. 1659. Stenny, and the dutchy of Barre with the flightinge of the citadell of Nancy. The 3d is, the concernment of the prince of Condé. France offers, that he returne home, and have all his possessions and estates, but not to be admitted into his ymployment as governor of Guyenne, grand maistre d' hostell, &c. The two former are upon the matter agreed. The 3d doth yet sticke; but Spayne sayth, that if the prince will not accept these conditions, they will quitt hym. As for Portugall, the French will not stand upon that; only they will mediate a peace betweene them.

I had a letter from general Montagu of the 3d instant dated from the coast of Jutland, or but 40 leagues from the Sound. I rest

I FORMERLIE made bold to write to you concerning the governor of Berwick, that you would be pleased to afford him your favour in some businesse he hath to doe with his highnesse; and I shall take itt as a speciall favour, if you please to give him a dispatch in his businesse, being I thinke it very needfull he was at his garrison. And likewise I have another request to you, that you would acquaint his highnesse, that such judges as belong to Scotland, that are in the parliament, whereof there is my lord Warestonne of the other house, and judge Swintoune, and judge Lawrence, of the house of commons, may be heere against the beginning of June; for then their sessions (which wee call terme in England) begins, and lasts fower monthes; and the people will suffer much in their law businesse, and cry out for want of itt. I thought fitt to give you notice of itt, that timely care may bee taken of that particular. I heare, that there is one or two, that lie ready in Holland with commissions from Charles Stuart to come into this country: one of their names is Hamilton; but whether they lie there till such time as we disagree among ourselves, or whether they intend to come speedily over with them, I knowe nott; butt this I heare from good hands: which is all at present from him, who is

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

I HOPE your honour hath communicated on thursday last the 14th of this instant my Vol. lxiv. papers to his most serene highness and the council, concerning the ship the Maria, p. 113. brought up at Toolon, and the three ships having ballast only, which have been detained ever since the month of January last past; and in the latter end of March brought up by the Lamport frigate, captain Coppin commander, at Plymouth and Portsmouth; which ships having at least four or five and twenty men every one, and their victuals being all spent, by reason that they have had aboard many men out of the frigats, which did seize them, and wanting moneys, as well as wares or merchandizes, are utterly undone.

The poor men, whose ships have been taken by captain Robert Bowden and Cornelius Swart, pretending to have Swedish commissions, are also greatly afflicted; which necessitateth me to beseech your honour, that favourable resolutions may be taken by his most serene highness and the council; and that the poor men may have restitution of the said ships and goods, with just and reasonable satisfaction for the damages. The said proceedings are so directly contrary to the late treaty of peace, and to law and reason, that I hope, that his highness and the council will be sensible thereof, and order effectually, that the said unjust proceedings may be rectified; which is heartily wished for the mutual welfare of all honest men in both states and nations, by

Most humble and most affectionate servant,

Dr. Thomas Clarges, to H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

THIS last weeke our consultations in parliament were for the most part preparatory to In the possession of the right hon. the earl of Shelburne. matters of accounts, and ended in a resolution to meet yesterday in a grand committee to consider of our debts, and the present necessities of the armies, and the ways of retrenching the charge of the commonwealth, and improving the revenues thereof. But before this resolution was put in execution, a motion was made concerning the meetings of the officers of the armies in a generall counsell, whereby it was said some umbrage was put upon the parliament. And after a long and serious debate it was voted, that during the sitting of the parliament there shall be no generall councill or meeting of the officers of the army without the direction, leave, and authority of his highness the lord protector and both houses of parliament. And after this it was resolv'd, that no person shall have or continue in any command or trust in any of the armies or navies of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or any the dominions or territories thereto belonging, who shall refuse to subscribe, that he will not disturbe nor interrupt the free meetings in parliament of any the members of either house of parliament, or their freedom in their debates and counsells;

A.D. 1659. and to these votes it was resolved, that Mr. Stevens should desire the concurrence of the other house, which he did this day, and carried them up with a returne, that they would send answer by messengers of their owne. I am told, the other house was in a great consternation upon receipt of these resolutions of ours, and were so high, as many moved to lay them aside, and it was carried but by one voice in the contrary, which I somewhat admire; for without doubt, if they disagree with us in these, a farther transaction may be doubtfull. I must not forget to acquaint your excellency, that after wee had pass'd the before-mentioned vote, wee order'd to take speedily into consideration the arrears of the armies and navies, and how they may be discharged; and appointed Mr. attorney generall and sargeant Maynard to bring in an act of indemnity to such as have acted in the service of the commonwealth. Wee likewise taking notice of a more then usuall confluence of cavalier and dissaffected persons to this citty, nominated a committee to bring in a declaration for their removing twenty miles from London, which was this day brought in and pass'd; but being upon some necessary occasions absent, I cannot give your excellency any particular accompt of the wording it. Doctor Petty this day sate in the house, and upon thursday next he intends to give a generall answer to the charge against him. I have made many of our stediest men favourable in their opinions of him, and am not much diffident of our good successe, to which all the endeavours shall be contributed of,

May it please your EXCELENCY,

Your excellencie's most humble, and most obliged servant,

THO. CLARGES.

Yesterday his highness sent for all the officers of the army, and comanded them to their severall charges, to which I hope they will give a ready obedience; but to-morrow was a day they had formerly appointed to meet, and some suspect they will, notwithstanding his highness commands or our votes; but I hope and beleive the contrary.

Mr. John Barwick to Sir Edward Hyde.

London, April 19. 1659. late at night.

In the possession of Joseph Radcliffe, of the Inner Temple, esq;

I HOPE this will find a safe passage, as your lordship's of the 4. instant, did, which I have received, and which at first did not a litle trouble me, when I saw such a great difference in the account between mee and the person intrusted in that business. And yet, upon better consideration, I conceive the difference will be easie to reconcile; and that what he gives in upon account, is all that can be charged upon him. For though I delivered to Mr. Gregson 635 l. upon the first account, and 500 l. upon the later, (deducting only what it fell short in telling, whereof I gave his M. some accompt in my former letters) yet there must not so much be charged upon the accountant there by 200 l. because Mr. Shaw received 100 l. of this, before ever he had any thing to doe with it, and Mr. Thornton received another 100 l. here, which he returned by another person, as he tells me, and whereof his M. hath already acknowledged the receipt. For the rest, wherein the accomptant's reckoning falls short of what your lordship charges upon him as from my account, it was caused by the want of money in the baggs upon telling, and other incident charges given in by Mr. Gregson per bill, whereof I sent your lordship a true copy in my last, and which I hope will farther clear the reckoning to be according to this account I now give of it. The accomptant's brother tells me, the rest of the money is payd in, (and I hope it is so) as far as the accomptant hath received it, and that I hope is all but the unfortunat 200 l. for as for the other 100 l. which he feared, Mr. Gregson tells me from his own letter, that he believes it is received. For the desperat 200 l. I doe verily beleive the hazzard could not be foreseen in morall probability; for I take Mr. Gregson still to be a very honest and prudent man. I did from the begining and doe still leave the managery of such things wholly to himself; and particularly I have referred it to him either to compound, (as the rest of the creditors doe) or to stand to the hazzard of recovering the whole hereafter, in case he hath (as some doe) broke out of designe. For as I must confesse my ignorance in such things, so, if I were never so skillfull, I conceive it would not be prudence for me to be seen in the least in such a matter. For the third parcell mentioned in my last, I hope the bills are come for the former money; and for the later, Mr. Gr. tells me, he could get no bills for it this week, which he durst trust, unless it had been from the same persons, who returned the last, which also would have been somewhat somewhat hazzardous; but he doubts not but by the next post he shall send such bills for A.D. 1659. the remainder as may be relyed upon. For any particular instructions given by me to the accomptant, I must disclaim them, excepting only to receive the money, and pay it, which I never intended to stand in opposition to any command he should receive there, whereof I am and ever shall be most tender, as in duty I ought: and accordingly this last time I have expressly referred him to his M.'s command and order, as I think I mentioned in my last. For my sick friend, he is so well recovered, as to take his journey this day towards his own country, by his physician's advice, for aire and exercise, but chiefly in order to his owne business there. He presents his humble service to your lordship, as possibly you will perceive by another person. The friend I hinted in my last could not then come, but I hope will now. His memory will much ease my pen and your lordship's patience in poynt of newes. Yet something I shall here inclose at all peradventures; for I see this paper will not hold it. I beseech your lordship excuse this prolixity in him, who much honours you, though he never had the happiness to see you, and will ever endeavour to approve himself,

MY LORD,

Your lordship's most humble servant.

From colonel Bamfylde.

MY LORD,

I Spoke both yesterday and on saturday with the gentleman, whose trusts me in his communications with your lordship's, whose I finde very apprehensive of, and solicitous for the preventing those dangers, which he thinkes may arise to the nation, my lord protector, and themselves, from the present state of affayers. In the first place, on saturday he protested solemnly, (upon my saying something, which led him to it) that as he could not answer for other, yet for himselfe he knew nothing before-hand of the debates or transactions of the army: that neither immediately nor mediately he had the least communication with any of them. If any els had, they did not trust him with it. However, that upon the termes he stands at present of treaty with your lordship, he thinkes it just and necessary to let you know, that as he does not wish, that the army should impose lawes upon my lord protector and the parliament, so he is very sorry to see such rough expedients resorted to, as may endanger the dividing of that power, which he considers as the sole bullwarke and defence of his highness and his friends, and of the commonwealth. Touching the votes, which passed yesterday in the house, though he opposed them, for his owne as well as the publique safety, in this common tyme of danger, yet he dreads the consequence of them. If they are obeyed, he fears the presbyterians will thereby be raysed to that height, as to impose their owne lawes upon all: if they are disobeyed, 'twill endanger the dividing of the army (which some to violent persons on both sides labour at) and the ruine of the nation; that, to prevent it, he wishes your lordship would thinke of some speedy expedient to sweeten your yesterday's votes, before discontents grow too high. The way he thinks for it, is to fall upon the immediate settlements of your militia, which he thinkes will be best in my lord protector and the parliament; that there be noe general; that my lord protector comissionate them with the consent of parliament; that in the intervalls of parliament, his highness may doe it with the consent of his councill, if any charges fall voyde: that if you thinke this a good expedient, and please to let him know it by mee, he will prepare to advance it what he can. In the next place, he wishes, for the common peace and safety, that you would thinke of a speedy way of bringing in such moderate expedients for the settlement of the government, as may be satisfactory to honest and moderate men on both sides, to which he will contribute all he can in his sphere, that things may not lye thus loose and open, to much exposed to all sorts of danger: that if you designe the cementing of the presbyterians and commonwealth party, that they may be a little taken off from that violence, which upon all occasions they may make appear to the exasperation of the other. He says, that about 3 or 4 days one told him, (I suppose it might be lieutenant-general Ludlowe, though he named him not) that my lords Fleetwood and Desbrowe had spoken very honorably of your lordship; and that he is very sorry to see you soe neer a division at the present. Thus much I thinke I had leave to acquaint you with from him: divers other things passed, of which good use may be made, if I could have your honour to speake with you. I told your lordship concerning the lifting of some of the levelling party; I am confident is true. I have put one to get in amongst some of them in Southwark, to discover what he can; and I shall give you an account thereof. Cockayne reports, that the army designs to drawe up a charge agaynst your lordship, lord Jones, and some others; and that your party intends to drawe up one agaynst my lord Fleetwood and Desborowe, and others of the army: that there were

A.D. 1659. were designes to adjourne the parliament into the citty, which he says is put into a good posture. That they care not for your army, and wayte only comands from my lord protector. I thought theise reports soe foolish and dangerous, that I a little reproved him for publishing them soe much as he does. If your lordship really desires my going into Flanders, this is throughly critical tyme to lay the foundation for that designe, in which I am confident you may doe what you will. There needs not much more deliberation thereon than what has been had. I wish you would be pleased to think of something to bee sayd to Mr. S. whoe said 2 things more to mee, that I would acquaint you with, but not in this way. I shall say noe more for the present, but that I am,

MY LORD,

Your LORDSHIP's most humble, and

MY LORD,

Vol. lxii.
p. 7^{PO}.

THE haste I perceaved your lordship in the last night caused mee to omitt some things, which upon recollection of myselfe I have thought requisite to give you this further account of: that there are new tamperings with some of the inferiour officers of the army; that those, whoe contrive them, have hopes of the success to the ends they drive at, either to hinder theyr concurrence in the dissolution of the parliament, which is suspected, in case the question shall be carryed agaynst the present house of lords; or to rayse disorders amongst them, if it should be broaken up. They speak of some conferences your lordship has not long since had with some of the chiefe officers of the army, the place where, the persons present, the matters in debate, together with the resulte of all they pretend to be acquainted with. If it be true, some have not been soe faithful or secret as they are believed. It is likewise sayd, that your lordship and my lord Desbrowe have made propositions to Sir Arthur Haslerig and Sir Henry Vane to bring them over; but fruitlessly.

My lord Lambert, they say, endeavours to heighten the commonwealth party against the present government; vindicates himselfe, touching his past actings for the late lord protector, by his being animated against divers of the principal persons of the long parliament, by the instigation of his late highness, whoe, he sayes, privately perswaded Sir Henry Vane and Sir Arthur Haslerig against his being sent into Ireland with convenient powers for the charge of lord deputy, both upon religious and prudent pretences; and that as soone as he had underhand crossed him in that employment, he was the first, whoe exasperated him agaynst those persons, telling him, that not any thing troubled him more than to see honest John Lambert soe ungratefully treated; with many other expressions to this purpose. I had this from a good hand, and that he makes great professions of syncerity to the party he now acts with; has had private conferences with some of the chiefe of them, labouring to bring them on, whoe need noe spurs in theyr present expedition. Your lordship, whoe knowes how entyrelly lost I am already, will, I am sure, have to much charity to expose me further, by letting this come to their ears, whoe will easily judg at the author. I may arive at a more particular knowledg of things of this nature. My letters out of Germany say, that the confederate princes have an army drawne together of 19000 fighting men, to oppose the arch-duke of Insburg's march into Flanders; that marshal La Ferté is to joyne his troopes with then. to that purpose; and that in case of extremity, that those troops cannot pass, it is believed, that the Austrian army in Holstein under Montecuculi will have order to march through Westphalia, and soe through part of the state of Holland's dominions into Flanders. The electors of Mentz and Collogne have written positively to the emperour, that it is against the constitutions of the empire, that the diet of deputation should bee translated to any other place from Franckfort; and that considering the present danger, which threatens the peace of the empire, it cannot be suspended, they being resolved to continue it for the tranquility of the empire. The elector Palatine was desired to subscribe it; which he excused, writing a particular letter to the emperor in calmer language then it seems that was drawne up in. He intends to keep himselfe neuter, if he can. These are the chief heads of my letters, which have many more particulars, are longe,

longe, and in French ; but if your lordship please to command them, I shall send them, A.D. 1659.
being with great fidelity and respect,

MY LORD,

Your lordship's most humble, and Tewfday night.

most obedient servant,

Jo. B.

Colonel Bamfylde to secretary Thurloe.

MY LORD,

'TIS to save your lordship's trouble, and not my owne, that I choose rather to write then ^{Vol. lxii.}
wayte upon you, unless very important reasons require it. After I had sent my letter ^{p. 656.}
to you the last night, young Mr. S. came to my lodgings, told mee he had earnestly importuned his father to fall into my lord protector's interests, whome he found much shaken betwixt the desires of putting himselfe into a capacity to advantage himselfe and children, and how to doe it with the conservation of his owne honour, which he thinkes cannot consist with an abrupt relinquishing of his friends and party, or with the entyre abandoning of his former principles. The son tells mee what I had heard before from other hands, that your lordship, and some other of the councell, have lately had a meeting with the principal officers of the army ; and that you there proposed their desiring my lord protector's takeing upon him the generalship of the army, the dissolving of the parliament, and the settling a course for the rayfing of monyes, for the paying the armye's arears, and for theyr future support : that my lord Whaly, my lord Goff, and some others, were for it ; but my lord Fleetwood, and my lord Desbrow agaynst it, as an expedient too full of hazard, and not to be resorted to, saveing in the last and greatest extremity. Many wish it as a means to render my lord protector's government insupportable, and irreconcilable with the commonwealth party, if not soe with future parliaments, since they conclude, if you cannot agree with this, that 'tis most unlikely, that you ever should with any, upon the principles you now goe ; and that you will be constrained, either to vary from them, or to governe arbitrarily and entyrelly by the power of the army, which they thinke can never laste longe in this nation. I only tell you, what I hear from others, not as it is my owne sense. The odium of this is endeavoured to be fixed on your lordship, and my lord Fines. If you are wronged in it, I know your wisdom sufficient to finde out some expedient to vindicate yourselfe in such a manner, as I may not be thought your informer ; whoe I desire you not to consider any longer, then you finde mee ingenious and syncere towards you ; and whilst I observe these rules, I know your lordship has too much candour and good nature to let mee be hurt by my endeavours to serve you. Mr. S. says, my lord Desbrow sent to have a meeting with him, and I beleive upon deliberation he is not satisfied with himselfe for declining it. He seemes resolute not to recede from what he delivered touching the other house ; first, because it is his sense, to which you know he is something pertinacious ; next by reason, that he has declared himself ; but if that were carryed once in the affirmative against his judgment, I perswade myselfe he might in other things be taken off from the triumvirate, though the other twoe have still great influence upon him. He pretends himselfe to have been much exasperated by some of my lord protector's party, threatening in the house the parliament should be dissolved, and major-generalls re-established. He named some of them to mee, and that one tolde him in the house, that the grounde of his opposition was, because he was not secretary of state. I confesse it did not looke like a very wise expression, if they had any designe to gayne him. I thinke there may be wayes thought on to remove the rest of his scruples, if the debate concerning the lords house were over. If your lordship would bee more clearly enlightned touching any of these particulars, I shall wayte on you, when you please to command me ; or if what I have written bee sufficient, I shall discourse further with him, if you approve it ; soe you will please only to write mee word, that you would have me doe what I have written, I mean in soe many words, without mentioning either person or particulars. I finde my lord Lambert labours to serve theise warme people to the greatest height. What his end may bee in it, I can better conjecture, than others devine, who know not soe much as I doe concerning him. Young S. told me of another particular, which I thought very important ; but I cannot call it to mind, till I speake with him agayne. I am,

MY LORD,

Your lordship's moste humble, moste faithful,

Wednesday night.

and moste obedient servant,

J. B.

Mr. John Barwick to Sir Edward Hyde.

A.D. 1659.

In the possession of Joseph Radcliffe, of the Inner-Temple, Esq;

BY some letters I have seen out of these parts, I perceive it is the opinion of some there, that the protector hath done his work in getting the other house to pass the vote of the commons. But by experience he finds it otherwise for the present; for the other house is another clogg upon him, and such a one, as we conceive hath encouraged the army to their late interposition into the affaires of state, wherein they durst not so well have medled, if they had been obnoxious to the power of one house alone, who in some heat might in an hower's time have voted them all out of their commissions; whereas now it must pass two houses, and in the later find 22 great officers of the army beside other favourers, though I doe not say, that all of them approve what the councill of officers have done. What that was, will appear by their petition, though hee, that reads it without the commentary of their actions, will not perfectly understand it. For though it pretends as faire to the Whitehall party as the commonwealth's men, yet it now appears the petitioners more favour the later. I suppose the meaning of it was to be a foundation of some endeavours to give lawes to both parties, but to favour that the more, which favoured their proceedings, and by them to quash the opposition of the rest. The method of this was, by forming a thing they call an attestation (in the nature of a new covenant or ingagement) to justify the murder of the king, the disinherishon of his posterity, and all things passed since 48. But they had a speciall ey upon kingship, as they called it, under which the Whitehall party did believe they would containe all monarchicall power, which made them the more vigilant and jealous over them. And this is the day the army officers appoynted to meet, and signe this attestation. To prevent which, the commons on monday did more work than all the time since their first convention. For having shutt themselves in, and even their own members out, that were not then within, they proceeded to these votes: 1. That the officers hereafter shall have have no meetings without the approbation or command of the protector, and both houses: 2. That no person shall have or continue in any command or trust in any of the armies or navies of England, Scotland, and Ireland, that shall refuse to subscribe, that he will not disturb or interrupt the free meetings in part, or any of the members of either house, nor their freedom in their debates and counsell: 3. That these votes be sent to the other house for their concurrence: 4. That it be referred to a committee to consider of a way for raising money to pay the armie: 5. They referred it to serjeant Maynard, the attorney and sollicitor generall, to bring in a bill for securing the protector and parliament against those, who have formerly been in armes for the king; which I hear was done yesterday; but how farr it extends, I have not yet had the opportunity to enquire. I know not but I may have forgot something they ordered for the indemnity of the soldiery; for the bearer hastens me.

Notwithstanding all this, I hear from a good hand, the officers intend to meet this day, as they had appoynted, and to proceed as they see cause; and the thing they will chiefly insist upon will be the pay of the army, for that will have the best influence upon the common soldiers. I am told, the regiment, that was Pride's, have in a short remonstrance (now printed) declared for the councill of officers; but I have not seen it; and it is very likely the same method will be pursued by others. But yet on saturday last those officers, that are of the protector's party, were with him, and have promised him to live and dye with him, viz. Howard, Faulconbridge, Ingolsby, Gough, &c. I know not their number. The same night they were in some fear at Whitehall to have the protector's person ceased on by the other party; and accordingly were vigilant, had strong guards, and new provision of amunition. The city also think it necessary to look to themselves in this conjuncture. On monday the common counsell sate, and yesterday the officers of the militia. I suppose the former was but only to quicken the latter; and what the later have resolved, I cannot yet learn. The parliament have an eye upon the city as the securest place to sit in, if this storm continues; and perhaps the army may be as willing it should be so as the citizens, that they may have such a fatt enemy to deal with; but however, they have sent a horse-guard to St. Paule's church again these 4 or 5 dayes, which was formerly withdrawn, and only a foot-guard kept there. What all this will produce, we cannot yet foresee; but the disease is just upon the crisis, and I hope God will turn all things to the best.

We have no newes at all from our fleet, since they set sayle for the Zound. The merchants complayn still, not without cause, the Spanish warr has a very great influence upon most of them. They have lost above 1200 shippes since the warr began, and yet we bragg of our prizes. The publick debts amount to about 2 millions and a half, and no way is yet thought on for payment besides those formerly on foot, which come short of the ordinary expences by a very great sum, as they tell us. And the excise is petitioned against in severall particulars by severall trades, and would be by more, if their petitions could be heard.

To his most serene highness RICHARD lord protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the territories thereto belonging;

The humble petition of Charles de Bils, a captain in the service of his majesty the king of Portugal,

Most humbly sheweth,

THAT your petitioner is a native of France, but a subject to his majesty, from whom he is commissioned a man of war against the king of Spain and those of the United Provinces. And having by virtue of his said commission taken a Dutch ship, was necessitated, by reason of contrary wind, and want of victuals, to come into the Isle of Wight, in your highness's dominions. His said prize, person, and man of war was there arrested by order of the lord ambassador Nieuport, by virtue of a warrant out of your highness's court of admiralty; to which your petitioner made his appearance by way of defence. But the said ambassador, finding your petitioner's commission legally granted, did desist from his proceedings there, by divers opprobrious memorials did complain and seek remedy from your highness and council, and in the interim procured several arrests against your petitioner in great sums; and likewise inticed others to imprison him, knowing your petitioner to be a stranger, and not to be bailed, thereby to deprive your petitioner from answering for himself

PURSUANT to your order, I convoyed the Bristol fleet in safety within Londy, and arrived att Milford the fourteenth of this instant Aprill, where I used such dilligence to victuall and tallow the friggott under my command, that I sett saile from thence the twentieth. And haveing certaine sailes at Kinsale, of which our friggott hath present occasion, I plyed thitherward, and on the 23d in the morning tooke a galleote hoigh of the enemies, comanded by captain Nicolas Johnson, who had his comission from James Steward, and hath this spring greatly anoyed and infested their parts. The said galleot had two guns, and thirty-five men, of which seven are gon in a prize: the rest I have brought in to Kinsale this day; and the governor of the fort hath promised to take care to have them safely garded to Corke prizon. I have reserved the captain and the vessel to present unto your excellency, when it shall please God to bring us to Dublin. I remaine, there was then som doubt, whether the army would acquiesce; and if they should not,

it were very sad. It is a time, that calls for much prayer and dependance upon God.
Pray, Sir, let mee heare from you. I am not well, which is the only cause, why I doe

I SEE by your letters to Mr. secretary, in what state things are between the two kings of Sweden and Denmark, and how far you have proceeded upon your instructions; and we judge, that your carriage therein hath been as with fidelity, so with prudence and circumspection. And truly as things stand both here at home and abroad, I think it not adviseable to engage the fleet, until there be further light had into that affair, and the issue of the intended treaty be seen, and that you have given an accompt thereof hither, and received further direction. And therefore in case the Dutch fleet do arrive in those parts, you shall carry yourself friendly towards them, and use your endeavours, that by consent they may not give their assistance to the Dane, until the issue of the treaty be known, but not engage with them, unless it be in your own defence. And to prevent inconveniencies of this kind, we are endeavouring a treaty with them to the purpose of the inclosed papers; which if it be concluded, there will be further time given to understand the final resolutions of both kings, and give this state a better measure, how to proceed towards both or either of them. Whitehall, 1. May, 1659.

Your very affectionate friend.

Mr. John Barwick to Sir Edward Hyde.

MY LORD,

London, May 2. 1659.

In the possession of Joseph Radcliffe, of the Inner Temple, esq;

THIS bearer makes my writing of little use to any other purpose, then only to shew, that I am loth to omitt any opportunity to serve you. As it hath been his work to come well furnished with the knowledge of our present condition, so would it be my wisdom to be silent in those things, because at this time they are at best to me very mysterious as to matter of fact. I sent it (the same night the parliament was dissolved) to that friend, who was wont to present my letters to your lordship, with directions to acquaint your lordship with it. Whether it passed or no, I know not (for there was a search of letters that night); but I thought that the liker way then an immediat address to your lordship, especially considering that (I fear) my hand is not yet forgotten by some in the letter-office, which makes me still cautious in the writing that way. Since that time there hath not passed any thing of moment; for they are still at a stand in expectation, how Hen. Cromwell, Montagu, and Monk will take it. For the first of these, they are in some fear of him, (especially since Locker delared against what they had done) because of his interest in that army. The younger Ingoldsbey is got over to him, with hopes to play that game there, which he could not here. They have some hopes of Monk's army, or at leste a party in it, but very little of himself, especially now that money faills them. They despair (almost) of Montague's person; but not of some considerable persons aboard that fleet; and to play their pranks the better, they have sent Lawson with letters and instructions (and perhaps a commission also) to see how he can work upon the seamen.

It is not probable Montague and Desbrough should ever peece together; but that is not now so considerable as it was at first, for both Desbrough and Fleetwood are now as low in the esteem of the officers, as before they were high, being looked upon as self-seekers, in that they are for a protector (now they have got a protector of wax, whom they can mould as they please, and lay aside, when they can agree upon a successor); whereas the common volge of the army is for a commonwealth, and the long parliament revived. They sit now in severall juncto's. The field-officers at Wallingford-house, the captains at St. James's (where Vane and Hefilrige have some influence); and they talk of a third party of under-officers or agitators; but I canot learn, by which of the parties they are set up, or whether they stand upon a bottom peculiar to themselves. They do not hitherto clash one with another, nor much agree, though they give it out, what they doe is upon joynt interest. In probability, the great officers will yeild to the captains to preserve their places, especially being divided among themselves, since Gough and Ingoldsbey, &c. were voted out of their commands, and Okey and others of their party put in. If the newes of Locker's dissent (or other things of that nature by the post) put not a remora in their way, they intended this day to adjourn the terme, and in pursuance of their designe to proceed on to the recalling of the long parliament, and then have all process at law as before, in the name of the custodes libertatis, &c. But how this will be done, I know not, unless the judges will doe any thing, or the protector consent to any thing; for they say he much repents of what is past. And to be sure he is looked upon by them (since Locker's dissent) as a person more considerable then before, as appears by their stronger and stricter guards about him.

Though

Though all the former great and suddain resolutions were wondered at by wise men, yet ^{A.D. 1659.} this most of all: for the rest were from one thing to another; this from something to nothing. Heretofore the intruder entered allways upon a full treasury; now the publick debts are above two millions sterling, besides their own divisions and the generall discontents, both in the city, and now carryed all over England by the dissolved parliament-men. The protector's servants at Whitehall remove their goods into the city, for fear of plunder; and both they and the generality of the city begin to wish his majesty were in England. The forces now on foot in England are thought not to be above 8000, whereof half are in or about this city; and if they could be drawn off by any diversion, there is a party in the city, which thinck themselves able to shake off that burthen for the future. I pray God to direct his majesty what to doe, and when. If they were once engaged in blood, party against party, the work would be easy. Till then any appearance would but unite them, as it is here generally conceived; and longer then such an opportunity perhaps may be as hazzardous on the other hand, lest the one party swallow up the other on a suddain. Our friends are most of them driven away by a proclamation, which makes both my intelligence, and especially my results upon it, the less considerable. But however it renders me the fitter object for your lordship's pardon; which I beg for him, who is,

MY LORD,

Your lordship's most humble servant.

The judges sitt at Westminster, for all the report of adjournment. There is a flying report, as if the protector had given them the slipp, and were gone. I am in such hast, as I cannot enquire into it, nor believe it upon this slight ground. If it be soe, the messenger will know it.

MY LORD,

THERE hath been such stopping, or at least searching of letters of late, as hath made the business, of which I formerly writt, to proceed on thus slowly. Mr. Gregson sent over two bills for the first moiety, and the second bills after them, both by the post; and no return is yet made, that the bills are received and accepted: till then, he tells me, he dares not return any more to the same persons, and can hardly find any other, where he can be so confident. But however, I have sent another bill for 100 l. by this hand, inclosed, to the person, to whom it is consigned. The second bill will come by the next post; and so will bills for the remainder, if Mr. Gregson hear from—that the first are accepted. I lately received a letter from him from Flushe, by which, and by his absence, I see the reason why he hath not written about the receipt of them. I am very much troubled at these delays; but it is not my fault, nor indeed (as I conceive) neither of theirs, but only the absence of the person, to whom they are consigned. I leave the other unfortunat business wholly to Mr. Gregson, to mannage it as he sees best. He is loth to come to a composition, because some other creditors still stand off; and yet he tells me he thinks he must compound. I find money might be very usefull here, to dispatch a messenger, as occasion serves: but I know not yet how to compass any; or if I did, yet it would be too much presumption in me to dispose of any without order. In this or any other thing, there is none more devoted to his majestie's service, nor shall be more observant of your lordship's commands, then he, who in all humility presents his duty to his majesty, and is,

MY LORD,

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

Dunkirk, 6. May, 1659.

Vol. lxiv.

P. 156.

I AM hereby humbly bold to give your excellency an account of the state of things in this place. I have writ three letters to the secretary of state, but have not received an answer to any of them, notwithstanding that I acquainted the secretary of state with the necessity, which we are in, in this place, both as to that of moneys, and many other things, without which it will be almost impossible to hold this garison, if the enemy should lay siege to us. First, We have scarce a dozen guns mounted about the town, upon good carriages; and at fort Oliver not one. 2dly, We have no planking for platforms; nor can we buy any, for want of money. 3dly, Our store of ammunition, as powder, match, and small shot, is much exhausted. 4thly, If the enemy should come before the town, we have not one bushel of corn, nor a bit of any provision to maintain ourselves in case of a siege. There are many other wants, that I wrote to my lord Thurloe of; but these things here named we must not be without. Since his excellency the lord ambassador's departure from hence, I have been put to many streights to get money for the soldiers weekly subsistence; but I am truly now put to my last shift. I borrowed 7000 l. of the magistrates of the town for the last week's subsistence. Truly I do not know what course to take for money for the next week; and without money it is impossible to live here. Things are at a dear rate, and the soldiers cannot be trusted; for many of them lie in barracks, and such places, where they have no landlords; and besides, we are at another great charge in rectifying and repairing the works in fort Oliver and this town. My lord ambassador ordered, before he went from hence, four half moons to be made at fort Oliver, with a false bray and a countercharge: the charge of which amounteth to a great sum of money. We have also all hands at work at this town, erecting new works, repairing old, and planting palisadoes round the town. In fine, since the frequent report of the peace between France and Spain, we have not omitted to do all that might be done for the strengthening of this garison. The work at the sand-hills goeth also on very fast, and we have now got to a good distance from the works of the town. We have every day three companies of soldiers, and sometimes four, besides an hundred boors, or country-men, sent from their several casstries, to work at this place. I acquainted the secretary of state in an answer, which I sent by captain Guy, that here are four vessels brought up by such as act under Swedish commissions, and the one under a Portugal commission. I desire to know his pleasure, whether the captains might sell their prizes here, or not; for they are very urgent to have liberty to sell, or to go forth of our port to their several masters of Sweden and Portugal; which indeed in reason cannot be denied. But I have persuaded them to stay, because I know, it will be of advantage to this place, if they may have liberty to sell here. The duties would amount to a pretty considerable sum, that would help us in this streight. I beseech your excellency to honour me with your answer in relation to these things. It would in my opinion very highly reflect upon the honour and reputation of our nation, if we should lose this town unhandsomely, that hath been so famous in our thoughts, before we had it. A little help will prevent that danger. The officers and soldiers are all very hearty and courageous, notwithstanding the want of money, the noise of the peace, and other discouragements laid upon them. When my lord ambassador went from hence, he promised to be absent but three weeks, and for that time left both money for the soldiers and the workmen; but it being to-morrow six weeks since he went from hence, your excellency may believe, that we have been very hard put to it. In his excellency's last to me he acquainted me with a cessation of arms between France and Spain, for two months, beginning on the eighth of May, new style, and ordered me to observe the same, with with further order from his highness, or the council, or himself. The governor of Newport A.D. 1659, sent a drum to know, whether I had orders about these nation. I sent another back with my answer, which was, in case he observed the cessation, all acts of hostility on my part should cease. I also sent a trumpet to St. Omar and Synch fort, to know what those governors would do in reference to the said cessation. But neither drum nor trumpet being yet returned, I cannot give you an account of their answer; but by my next I shall give your excellency an account, how the cessation is observed, and with what face things look in this time of cessation. My lord, I am exceedingly sorry to hear of those differences, which are amongst you, and make a very great noise here. The Lord give you all heart and eyes to think of, and look at the honour of God, who hath so long owned us, and the weal of our country. The Lord compose your differences, and unite you together, or otherwise it is to be feared you will give an advantage to that common enemy, who is indeed an enemy not only to you as you are men, but as you are good men, and profess godliness and sobriety. So craving your excellency's pardon for my tediousness herein, I humbly take leave, and rest,

MY LORD,

Your excellency's ever obedient servant,

ROG. ALSOPP.

The officers here desire to have their humble duty presented to your excellency.

General Monck, &c. to general Fleetwood, to be communicated to the generall councill of officers, at Wallingford house.

Right honourable and worthy freinds,

HAVING through the rich mercies of our most gracious God lived to see a revive of that glorious cause in your hearts, which hath bin sealed with soe much precious blood, attested with soe many glorious and signall providences of God, and purchased with soe vast a treasure of these nations; wee cannott butt (with the greatest demonstrations of joy and gladnesse) owne your late proceedings in pursuance of these blessed ends wee have for soe many yeares beene contending for; and that God hath att last, after soe many yeares declining and desertion from his and his people's cause and interest, turned backe your eyes uppon your former vowes and engagements made in the day of your espousalls, and begotten in you a livelie sense, both of your past faylinges and present duty, wee cannott butt looke uppon as the greatest and happiest prognostick of our future peace and establishment, that ever our eyes yett beheld; and accordingly doe with humbled hearts both reverence and embrace this dispensation of divine providence, as that wherby a passage is made for our enjoying these good thinges soe longe since hoped for: that God hath hitherto indulged us, whilst every one was following after his idoll, and advancing his particular interest above that of a God and his people, deserves to bee for ever had in remembrance, as that whereby wee are kept alive unto this day. Certainly had hee nott bin a longe-suffering God, and exceeding slowe to wrath, hee had longe ere now given us the dregs of his indignation to drinke, and made us a reproach and hissing to the adversaries of his truth, making us to reele and stagger, and dash one against another, till wee had accomplit that on ourselves, which the bloudest of our adversaries could nott have beheld without horreur and amazement. Butt now since wee hope the sense of these thinges lies as heavy on your spiritts as on our owne, wee shall cease to bee your remembrancers of what hath bin left undone, or done amisse, and putt you in minde of what in this great day of the Lord's appearing you ought to doe. And in this wee shall be very brief, intending to bee more particular, as occasion may offer.

In the first place, therefore, we earnestlie intreate you, that in the worke you have undertaken, as you would lay aside the interest of any private person, soe that your eye may nott bee fastened upon the interest of any particular partie whatsoever, as itt is distinct or subdivided from the whole interest of God and of those that professe his name in sinceritie and truth; butt that you would earnestlie studie and endeavour to advance such, in whose hearts the power of godlinesse shall be made manifest, through holy, strict, and religious conversation, although they may be of different mindes in the more externall and lesse necessary parts of religion.

2. That seeing his late highnesse hath bin pleased to manifest soe much self-deniall and love to his country, in appearing for the interest thereof against his owne, in this great day of change, that you will use your indeavours, with all affectionate care and industry, that himself and family (together with her highnesse dowager) may have soe honourable a provision settled upon them, and such other dignities, as are suitable to the former great services of that familie to these nations.

A.D. 1659. 3. That as you are of the free-borne people of England, and nott mercenaries, you will in your places, and according to the duty of your callings, maintaine the just liberties of the whole people, their good lawes, and righte; and remove all oppression and every heavy and intollerable yoake from off their neckes.

4. That you would asserit the freedome and priviledges of their representatives duly assembled, and consisting of persons rightly qualified; as being the basis and foundation of the government of this commonwealth.

And lastly, that as the best expedient for the curing our distempers, wee heartily rejoyce, that you have anticipated our desires in inviting the members of the longe parliament to re-assemble, and carry on the worke of the nation under a commonwealth government. And we desire, that you would owne them, and stand by them, as those, by whome God hath formerlie done glorious thinges for his people's libertie; and that some effectuall course be taken for begetting a good understanding and mutuall correspondency betwixt the parliament and army; that soe there may bee noe more dashing in peices, nor dissolvings of them, butt such as are regular, and according to the established forme of government. And wee doe assure you, that as in what you have already done in order to these thinges, you have our hearty and affectionate concurrence; soe our constant purpose and resolution is heerafter to stand by you and all the people of God in the maintenance of them against all opposers whatsoever. And that this good cause may prosper in your and our hearts and hands, is and shall bee the dayly prayer of

SO soone as I received the honour of your lordships commands, with the parliament's declaration of their intentions touching the settlement of the nations, I assembled the officers, and communicated the said declaration to them; as also the speciall care your lordships had of them and this place, by ordering money for its subsistence, and by expressing desires to know the wants of either, to the end they might be supplied.

All of us are sensible of your lordships goodnesse towards us; and I hope (when the Lord shall see fit to call for our wittnessing fidelitie to your lordships, and affection for the interests of the commonwealth) wee shall be enabled to give a better account of our zeale for both by our actions, then we can doe by our expressions. In the morning before your lordships came, at a full meeting of the officers, faithfulnessse to the present government, and obedience to all their commands, was unanimously resolved upon. The lyke was done by the three regiments at Amiens (who have orders to quarter at Bourbourgh, during the said suspension of arms between France and Spayne). I was rather desyrous to have them there neare us, then that they should march with the French army under M. de Lislon. I have ordered an account to be given me of the strength of this garrison, and its dependants; of the condition of our magazines; of what is due to the work-masters: all which I shall transmit by the next, and according to your lordships orders shall addresse my letters to the counsell of state. There have been severall pryzes brought in here during my absence, upon commissions from the Swed and Portugall. Tho' the pryzes be much embezled, yett I shall reserve what remaineth, till I receive the councill's commands concerning my duty in such cases. I shall lykewise discharge all privatt men of war from bringing pryzes into this port, or under the Splinter, without licence for their so doing from the counsell of state.

I humbly

I humbly beg your lordships mediation for my leave to come over. I shall putt things A.D. 1659. heare in that condition, as my absence for a short tyme shall be of no disadvantage. Coll. Allsopp will be more carefull and more diligent then I can be; and I should own as a greatt happineffe the opportunity of laying before the counsell of state the little I know touching their affairs with France, and the present tranfactings between France and Spain. If my humble desyer in this be not approoved of, I shall acquiesce into their lordships pleasure, and obey your lordships commands with a submission and respect, which shall evince the faithfulness of my being,

May it please your LORDSHIPS,

Your most humble and obedient servant,

WILL. LOCKHART.

Col. Alsopp to general Fleetwood.

MY LORD,

SINCE my last to your excellency, here hath not fallen any thing worth your know- Vol. lxiv. ledge, only that the last night his excellency my lord embassador came hither from P. 163. Paris, and was received with much joy and satisfaction to all, as well the magistrates of this town, the inhabitants, as the officers and foldiers; and as soon as he was come to his lodgings, he appointed a meeting of the officers to be at ten of the clock this morning, which was accordingly performed. And his excellency did then and there acquaint the officers with the transactions of things in England; and did also exhort and command the officers to a strict performance of their duty, notwithstanding the cessation made betwixt the two crowns of France and Spain, giving them good reasons to incite them thereunto; and did also acquaint them, that notwithstanding the change of government, which is now in England, that we were not to look upon particulars with the same eye, that we are bound in duty to look upon things of public concernment. And although the government were altered, the nation is still the same, and the concernment of the public also the same; for which we are immediately to act; and having through the providence of God procured this town to the use of our country, that we are to lay forth ourselves to the utmost of our power to keep and maintain it for the use aforesaid. We have also had a meeting this afternoon, occasioned by a letter to his excellency from the committee of parliament for safety. His lordship was pleased to acquaint us with the consequence of that letter; and truly I am bold to acquaint your excellency, that there appeared very much satisfaction in all the officers then assembled; so that I find not the least part of any dissatisfaction amongst any here. For indeed my lord embassador manageth all things with such prudence, as for my part I have scarce found the like in any; and I am bold to say, that he is a person as fit to be trusted in things of public concernment, as well to that of his fidelity, as that of his known abilities, as any person that I have yet had the honour to be acquainted with. My lord, the time of the cessation cometh on very fast, which was but at first spoken of for two months; and we being here so much unprovided of those things, which I writ to you for in my last, as ammunition, powder, match, small-shot, carriages for guns, with other materials for the gunners and fire-master, as also the want of provisions for the belly, or money to buy it with for a store; and that the enemy (without doubt) hath good intelligence of the nature of things here, may, for ought I know, be an inducement for them to lay siege to this town, as soon as any other place, it being a place of so great concernment to them; so that I again humbly make it my desire to your excellency, that these necessaries may be dispatched over, and I question not, by the assistance of God, but that his excellency the lord embassador, with those under his command here, will be able to give you a good account of this garison, tho' there should come a considerable army before it. So with my prayers to almighty God, for his hand of providence to lead you along in all your undertakings, I humbly take leave, and rest,

MY LORD,

Your excellency's ever obedient servant,

 p. 165.

I LATELY acquainted your honour with my present condition, which I am wholly ashamed to repeat, for it is really sad and deplorable. I humbly beseech you, if I have found any favour in your eyes, to assist me with some speedy relief as to money. According to that allowance of 500 l. per annum, that your honour promised me, accounting from that time to this, with all I have received from you, and by my employment of clerk of the signet, there is near an hundred pounds in arrears; besides 14 or 15 pound it hath cost me since your honour last paid me, for letters and packets from Piemont, and from M. Pell. &c. and about five or six pound I laid out for yourself in locks, a hatt, and other small things, which I never should have mentioned, had not necessity compelled me, being left to the wide world, without a penny of present income, and being not perfectly out of debt neither. I most humbly and earnestly beg your honour to take into your present consideration my condition, and to assist me with an hundred pounds, that so I may support myself, while I am soliciting for some employment under this new government; although I much feare, and am informed by some knowing persons, that the greatest obstacle in my way is, that I have been so diligent and faithful a servant of yours. I leave my present condition with you, which by how much the more sad and helpless it is, by so much the more it may be an argument to you, that I have served you faithfully, and have not sought myself, but the publick interest. Truly, Sir, I must suddenly be brought under great distractions and afflictions, except God touch your heart to give a speedy and effectual answer to this humble request of

A memorial of the Swedish commissioners to the council of state, delivered May 23. 1659.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

May it please your LORDSHIPS,

UNDERSTANDING that divers captains, who are in his majesty of Sweden's actual service, as likewise some native Swedes, who are sent from his majesty's fleet, are stopped in several ports of England, whereof one captain Swart hath been detained above a month, without the least intimation of the reasons thereof given unto us, his majesty's ministers residing here; we are forced to give your lordships this present trouble, and humbly to crave your redress, in regard it is the constant practice amongst all princes and free states in amity, to have a free access into each others havens; and in the late wars betwixt this commonwealth and Holland, the subjects of England used the same freedom in the haven of Gottenburgh, whither when any prizes were brought, they were suffered either to sell them there, or to take them out of the port, notwithstanding the opposition made by the Holland ministers there, and long since practised by the Hollanders against the subjects of this commonwealth, bringing in English vessels into their havens with Spanish commissions, and selling them there as good prizes. We humbly desire, your lordships will take these premises into your serious consideration, and suffer the said captains, now so long detained with those prizes they have lawfully taken, to be set at liberty; and if not permitted to sell them here, yet at least to depart unmolested out of your havens, and transport them to his majesty's dominions. Which favour his majesty, upon the like occasion, will be ready to acknowledge; and we shall take it as an obligation upon

Your LORDSHIPS

Most humble servants,

GEORGE FLEETWOOD,
HEN. FRESENDORFF.

The lord George Fleetwood representeth as followeth:

I. THAT captain Cornelius Peterfon Swart, commander of a private man of war, which now lies at Rye, having taken two prizes, and brought them up to Dover, upon some complaint made to the late council against him, he was sent for up by Mr. secretary; and there being, upon examination, no just cause found to detain him, he was dismissed, it appearing he is a native Swede, and that he came with him from Gottenburgh with a commission from the king of Sweden.

That he made application to Dr. Walker for advice, how to proceed against the said two prizes; who told him, that in regard of the late change, there was nothing at present to be done.

II. That captain Cornelius Claeson, by virtue of a commission from the king of Sweden, having the command of a man of war, and being a native of Gottenburgh, took a prize, and brought her into the isle of Wight. He coming to London, the merchants or owners of the said prize desired to speak with him, to make some agreement touching the said ship and goods; and under colour thereof, brought their action of 3000 l. against him, and cast him into prison, where he now remains.

III. That captain Hamilton, having likewise a commission from his majesty of Sweden, to command a private man of war, having lately taken a Dutch ship (off Yarmouth) bound from Bremen to Holland, the master and merchant on board agreed with him, to pay him 200 l. for discharge of the said vessel and goods, upon the arrival of the said ship at Yarmouth; which the said captain Hamilton being willing to consent unto, put into the said port, and going on shore, the master and merchant arrested him in an action of 4000 l. upon which he was carried to prison, where he now remains.

IV. That captain Arrington, being, by like commission from the king of Sweden, commander of the Christopher of Gottenburgh, lately took a small vessel in her ballast, belonging to a Hollander of Scheevelmy; and putting into the isle of Wight, major Bull, deputy governor of that place, caused the said captain Arrington's sails to be taken from his ship, with his guns and ammunition, and will not permit him to depart from thence without special order of the council of state.

May it please your HIGHNESS,

In the possession of Will. Cromwellesq;

I HAVE received no letters from your highness for some time before the last parliament was dissolved; myself, and the officers of the army, having been in a waiting frame to see what God or our superiors would command us; and in the same condition we remain still, desiring your highness to let us hear from you upon these matters. I have sent to my brother Fleetwood, upon the desires of the people here, a particular of such things, as they would gladly have granted, whereof this bearer, colonel Lawrence, can give your highness an account. I perceive, by him, he is known to your highness. I know not whether Sir William Bury, and Dr. Jones, who are sent upon the same message, have had that honour. They are my very good friends, and will be able to acquaint your highness with the several steps of our proceedings. I wish we have been mindful enough, and prepared for such dispensations, as the Lord may have for us. I am glad, at least, that our dear father went off in that glory, which was due to his actings. I pray God bear up your highness's spirit, and that we may be encouraged to do our duties. I remain

Your HIGHNESS's obedient servant,

DEAR BROTHER,

In the possession of Will. Cromwellesq;

I RECEIVED a letter, bearing date the tenth instant, subscribed by yourself, my lord Lambert, and others. In answer thereunto, I promised my endeavours for the peace of this nation, and withall an accompt of what the officers (to whom I communicated that letter, and the enclosed declaration) should resolve upon.

At first they had it in their thought to have made some address in writing themselves into England; but thinking, that their so doing might look too like a capitulation, they desired me to acquaint you, that they resolved to continue in a peaceable disposition, and to let you know, what things are conceived will strengthen therein, and be of general satisfaction to the whole nation; to which end I have sent over Sir William Bury, colonel Lawrence, and Dr. Jones, to conferr with you upon the particulars of a paper, wherein your care and dispatch will be of publick advantage. I remain

SIR,

London, this 24th of May, 1659.

THE posts have been so very uncertaine lately from Ireland, that I have heard but once A.D. 1659. from you these three weeks. There is a very good face upon our affaires heere, and all degrees of people seeme pleased (or at least acquiesce) in the present government. This day ^{In the possession of the} the Holland ambassador had audience in parliament; and, in the name of his masters, he ^{right hon. the} desired the renewing the amity betwixt us and them. I heare his late highness returned an earl of Shelburne. answered to the house this day to some message from them. The message related to the present condition of his revenue, his present debts, and how contracted; and how he approved this present government. To all which, I am informed, his answers were agreeable to the expectation and desire of the house, which was satisfactory. I hope all things are quiett in your parts; and that they may so continue both there, and in all the parts of these nations, is and shall be the prayer of

To the right honourable the council of state of the commonwealth of England, &c.

THE subscribed embassador from the lords the states general of the United Nether- Vol. lxiv. landish Provinces doth assure their honours in the name, and on the behalf, of the said lords his superiors, that they have no other intention or design, than to increase, confirm and corroborate the friendship, union, and alliance between the commonwealth of England and the United Provinces, grounded on the common interest of religion, state, and commerce: and that, concerning the wars and troubles in the Sound and Eastern countries, they have no other aim or design, than to preserve the freedom and liberty of the navigation and commerce, upon equal terms and conditions, as well for the commonwealth and the people of England, as of the state and people of the United Provinces, which is more fully expressed in the treaty concluded at Elbing in September, 1656. and the elucidations since agreed at Thoren by the Swedish commissioners, in the presence of the king of Sweden himself. And the lords the states general, having, at the invitation and desire of England and France, shewn their readines and willingness to mediate, and to co-operate jointly with England and France, in the re-establishing of peace and friendship between the high and contending parties, and agreed to the articles of the late treaty of the Hague, concluded and signed by the lord embassador of France and the resident of England, with the commissioners of the said United Provinces; and having also sent orders and instructions to the commanders in chief of their forces in the Sound and Baltic sea, as also four members . . . to the negotiation of the peace between the two Northern kings and kingdoms, the said embassador beseecheth, that it may please their honours, that he may know and be able to communicate to the said lords his superiors, what the sense and meaning is of the present government of this commonwealth concerning the ratification of the said treaty, and the further negotiations and transactions of the present affairs and occurrences in the Sound and Eastern countries. 187.

Ordered,

Vol. lxiv.

P. 183.

THAT the account of the state of the affairs between the commonwealth and other states, contained in four sheets of paper, herewith sent, be humbly offered to the parliament.

That upon mature consideration of the present state of affairs between this commonwealth and other states, the council found it very necessary to agree upon certain propositions to be treated upon with his excellency the lord embassador from the lords the states general of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, in order to the parliament's further pleasure to be declared therein:

That is to say, 1. That there have been orders already sent by this state to general Montagu, to pursue the late treaty, agreed at the Hague the $\frac{1}{2}$ of May instant; and this state is ready to give here their ratification thereof. 2. It is further propounded, that a longer time be agreed upon, of desisting from giving assistance, by either commonwealth, to the kings of Sweden or Denmark; to the end that, during that time, a treaty betwixt England and the United Provinces of the Netherlands be entered into, for the more effectual obtaining a peace between both the said kings; wherein the interest of both commonwealths, with respect unto each of their secure and free commerce into the Baltic seas, may be fully and equally provided for, and a firm foundation laid of a lasting peace and nearest union between themselves: That this treaty made be speedily endeavoured here, or by plenipotentiaries sent from both states, upon such place as shall be agreed upon between them.

That it be humbly offered, as the opinion of this council, that (in case the propositions be refused or delayed by the said lord embassador) further instructions may be sent to general Montagu, how to behave himself, in case the Dutch and Danes come to an agreement with the Swede, or shall endeavour to relieve Copenhagen, or transport any of the duke of Brandenburg's forces into any of the islands.

Sir Henry Vane is desired humbly to offer this report to the parliament.

SIR Henry Vane reports from the council of state a paper, delivered to the council of state from the lord embassador of the states general of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, which was read:

And also the treaty between the commonwealth, the states general of the United Provinces, and France, which were also read:

And also some propositions to be treated upon with the lord embassador of the lords the states general, which were also read:

And also the opinion of the council of state touching instructions to be sent to general Montagu.

Resolved,

Considerations on the three propositions exhibited to the subscribed ambassador from the lords the states general of the United Provinces.

I. IT is humbly offered, whether it be not convenient, to endeavour speedily to settle a Vol. lxiv.
peace betwixt the kings of Sweden and Denmark by a special treaty, wherein the P. 189.
interest of the commonwealths, with respect unto each of their free and secure commerce into the Baltic seas, may be fully and equally provided for; and whereby a firm foundation may be laid of a lasting peace and nearest union between themselves: and to that end and purpose, instructions and orders may be sent over to the respective public ministers in the Sound, or with the said kings of Sweden and Denmark, the said ambassador being willing to send to the public ministers of the said United Provinces his letters, that they may know, what hath been here agreed, and will procure a ratification of the lords his superiors, in a competent time.

II. The said ambassador is also ready and willing to enter into conference concerning the renewing and more firmly corroborating the treaties of amity and alliance betwixt the commonwealths of England and the United Provinces, on the grounds of the common interests of religion, state, and commerce.

III. And having prepared the particulars in reference thereunto, plenipotentiaries from both states may meet to perfectionate the said firm and nearest union, in such a place and manner, as shall be found most convenient thereunto.

Resolved,

That the persons to be named and impowered as aforesaid be five or any three of them, unless the council, in case of sickness, or other emergencies, shall see cause to constitute the commissioners to be four.

Resolved,

That instructions be given by the council to the said plenipotentiaries, or any other, in pursuance of the said resolutions.

Resolved,

Nieuport, the Dutch ambassador, to the admiral of the Dutch fleet in the Sound.

MY LORD,

Vol. lxiv.

P. 217.

IHAVE had several conferences with some considerable members of the council of state, since I have delivered new letters of credence to the parliament of the commonwealth of England, concerning the present occurrences of the Sound, and especially on the treaty concluded at the Hague the $\frac{11}{21}$ instant, betwixt the lord ambassador of France, the resident of England, and the commissioners of the United Provinces: it hath pleased the council of state to send to me the three propositions; a translated copy whereof is hereunto annexed.

The council of state have, on consideration thereof, promised me, that they would dispatch an express to their general, or commander in chief of the fleet of this commonwealth in the Sound, with the instructions contained in the paper herewith sent your excellency; and I have answered their lordships, that I was so well informed of the sincere intentions of the lords my superiors, that I would be ready and willing to write to your excellency, and seriously recommend it to your excellency, and to the extraordinary commissioners of the United Provinces, that on consideration of the said propositions, and that the parliament hath resolved to send, with all possible expedition, persons of honour and quality, as their plenipotentiaries, to establish a good and firm peace between the Northern kings and kingdoms, your excellency, and the said extraordinary commissioners, would agree with the general or commander in chief of the fleet of the commonwealth of England, that the three weeks mentioned in the third article, of the said treaty be continued and prolonged three other weeks, immediately following the expiration of the said former three weeks; and that in pursuance of the said three articles, they will take care, that none of the ships of war of the United Provinces, as well of the fleet, which is lately gone to sea, as of the other, which was sent to succour the king of Denmark, under your excellency's command, do act or attempt any thing contrary to the said third article, not only for the three

three weeks mentioned in the said treaty, but also for other three weeks immediately follow-^{A.D. 1659.}
 ing the expiration of the former three weeks. I have also assured the right honourable council of state, that your excellency, and the before-mentioned extraordinary commissioners of the United Provinces, will not be wanting to co-operate with the commanders in chief of the English fleet, and other the public ministers of England and France, in soliciting the said two Northern kings, during all the time of the three last weeks aforementioned, to abstain from all acts of hostility one against another by sea; and that the king of Sweden do abstain, during that time, from acts of hostility against any of the ships belonging to the fleet of the United Provinces, or their merchants ships. I have communicated the premises to the lords the states general, to the end, that they may ratify the same, and send their orders accordingly; and herewith remaining, &c.

In Westminster, the $\frac{3}{13}$ of June, 1659.

3^d June, 1659.

By the commissioners for the admiralty and navy.

IN pursuance of two several orders of the council of state of the twenty-third and thirtieth ^{Vol. lxiy.}
 of May last, copies whereof are hereunto annexed, whereby a memorial of the Swedish ^{p. 200.}
 commissioners, signifying the detention of several captains in the king of Sweden's service, and some native Swedes, with their prizes, in several parts of England:

As also a paper of the lord ambassador of the United Provinces, touching four ships now detained with their men at Queenborough, and their goods embezzled, are referred to the said commissioners, to examine the matter of fact, and to certify for what cause the said ships and men are so detained.

The said commissioners, upon consideration thereof had, finding the grievances respectively complained of in the said papers to concern two nations in amity with this commonwealth, do humbly offer, that the same may be referred to the admiralty-court, where all such causes are properly cognizable, to be determined according to law; and in case any orders have been issued forth by the state, touching the said persons or prizes, that they may be recalled.

All which, nevertheless, is humbly submitted to the consideration of the council.

AFTER consideration of the treaty at the Hague the $\frac{11}{21}$ of May instant, and after conference with the lord embassador of the United Provinces upon some proposalls herewith sent, and upon assurance, that he will send the like directions to the commanders in chief of the Dutch fleet, and advertisement to the public ministers of the United Provinces sent to the Sound upon that treaty, and procure from his superiors, that they shall also ratify and send the same, with all possible speed, from the Hague; the council have promised to the embassador, and do accordingly send these following instructions:

I. That in pursuance of the third article of the treaty at the Hague, you forbear to join the fleet under your command to the navy of either of the kings of Sweden or Denmark, or to give any aid to either of them, or to use any act of hostility against either of them, not only for the three weeks mentioned in the said treaty, as immediately subsequent to the notification of the treaty at the Hague to you; but also for other three weeks immediately following the expiration of the former three weeks.

II. That you co-operate with the commander in chief of the fleet, and other the public ministers of France, in soliciting the two Northern kings, during all the time of the three last weeks aforementioned, to abstain from all acts of hostility one against another by sea; and if that cannot be obtained, yet you shall endeavour, that the king of Sweden abstain, during that time, from all acts of hostility against any of the ships belonging to the fleet of the United Provinces, or their merchant-ships.

III. In case the instructions herein mentioned to be agreed to be sent from the embassador of the United Provinces to the commander in chief of the fleet, and other the public ministers of the United Provinces, (a copy whereof are herewith sent you) shall not be by them fully ratified, observed, and fulfilled, then you are left at full liberty to observe and prosecute such other instructions, as you have already received in that behalf, or shall receive from the parliament, or this council.

A paper of Nieupoort, the Dutch ambassador in England.

Vol. lxiv.
 p. 233.

THE lords the states general of the United Netherlandish Provinces, having perused the three propositions delivered unto the subscribed ambassador, on the twenty-sixth of May last past, stylo Angliæ, do trust, according to the last part of the first proposition, that two distinct acts of ratification of the late treaty, agreed and concluded at the Hague on the $\frac{11}{21}$ of May last past, the one for the lord ambassador of France, and the other for the lords the states general, have been sent over, or are in a readiness to be delivered there, the like acts of ratification being ready to be delivered at the Hague aforesaid to England and France.

The said lords the states general have, on the $\frac{19}{9}$ of May aforesaid, authorized their extraordinary commissioners, that in case the treaty of peace betwixt the two Northern kings should not be concluded within the three weeks mentioned in the third article of the said late treaty at the Hague, they might agree with the English and French public ministers in loco, a prolongation of some few days more. They have further given such orders and instructions to their before-mentioned commissioners, sent to the kings of Sweden and Denmark, that in case the public ministers of England and France have the like, that in all probability such a peace will be obtained and established between both the said kings, wherein the interest of both states and nations, with respect unto each of their secure and free commerce into the Baltic seas, may be fully and equally provided for.

It hath been very acceptable to the said lords the states general, to see, that this government had a good inclination to lay a firm foundation of a lasting peace and nearest union betwixt the commonwealth of England and the state of the United Provinces, and have not been wanting on their side to send hither sufficient orders and instructions to that purpose, which they hope will be of great efficacy to establish a true and confident amity, and to prevent and avoid all occasions of unkindness and sinister and unfriendly encounters and dealings between the people and subjects of both.

Therefore doth the subscribed ambassador seriously desire, that the said treaty may be speedily promoted and furthered here; and that the said treaty at the Hague being duly ratified, the plenipotentiaries of this commonwealth may, without further loss of time, endeavour such a treaty in the Eastern parts, by the joint concurrence and co-operation of the said extraordinary commissioners of the United Provinces in loco, as will be most satisfactory to the common and mutual interest of both.

WIL. NIEUPOORT.

By the committee appointed to treat with the Dutch ambassador.

Vol. lxiv.
 p. 231.

THAT in pursuance of the commands of the council, they did treat with the lord Nieupoort upon his paper, given in to the council, bearing date the fifteenth of June.

First, that there were some expressions in that paper, which seemed to be dark, and not full according to the intent of former resolutions; to which it was answered, that he had not as then full instructions.

Two things to be explained. In the next it was desired, that he would explain some expressions, which had fallen from him, concerning given assistance to the king of Denmark, and what assistance was intended.

His own words to be explain'd. To which was answered, that it was always intended, that Copenhagen should be relieved; and that it was very just and honourable to assist a distressed king, &c.

Relief always intended. To this replied, that indeed there was something of difficulty, and it was very necessary, in order to a full and good understanding betwixt the commonwealth, that the intention of this assistance should be, and that if it should be so wholly debarred the loss of Copenhagen, it might argue a difficulty upon the Dane and the Dutch, reduced to a condition of dependence upon the English.

What that relief should be; and may not be to the extreme on either side.

And

And further, there might such an assistance be given, that might put the king of Denmark into a condition to refuse all terms of a reasonable peace; and therefore it was most requisite for both, that things should remain in the condition they were in. Best to remain as they were.

To this it was replied, that the difficulty and danger of the 4000 men to remain on shipboard was great, for fear of sickness, and therefore used as an argument. 4000 men on shipboard contract sickness.

To this it was agreed, that a neutral place should be condescended to; and,

That we tendered the said third articles of the treaty at the Hague. Neutral place.

To which it was answered, that it was given in mandatis to the lord Opdam and ministers, that it should not be done but by consent of the general Montagu, &c. Urge 3d artic.

That Montagu should refuse and not give consent; to this was answered, that he did hope, that he did confidently hope to the contrary; but nothing could be drawn from him. If Montagu will not yield.

Next, we answer you to the first proposal of a nearer, viz. plenipotentiaries shall be presently sent. Next, a nearer unity.

The answer of the council of state by acts of parliament to the lord Nicuport, ambassador to the states general of the United Provinces, to his lordship's paper dated the fifteenth of June, 1656.

THE council, in pursuance of their paper bearing date the twenty-sixth of May, 1659, for laying a firm foundation of a lasting peace and nearest union betwixt both commonwealths, have been, and are ready effectually to promote the same; and when it shall be desired, will appoint commissioners to treat with his said lordship thereupon. Vol. lxiv. P. 223.

And for what concerns the establishing a peace betwixt the two Northern kings and interest of both commonwealths, with respect unto their secure and free commerce into the Baltic seas, they have already appointed their plenipotentiaries, who shall be dispatched with all speed to the Sound, fully instructed and impowered to endeavour the same in their proceeding thereupon, to communicate councils in amity and confidence with the ambassadors or ministers of the lords the states general of the United Provinces; and doubt not but that the said ministers of the lords the states general are impowered to exercise the like communication mutually.

And lastly, as to what concerns the ratification of the treaty at the Hague, they have already assured them of the readiness of the state to ratify the same, which they are still ready to effect, if it shall be insisted upon.

H. Cromwell's resignation of the government of Ireland to the parliament.

MR. SPEAKER,

I AM soe unwilling to interrupt the peace of these nations, that I think it my duty to prevent even those feares and jealousies, which may give any occasion thereof; and in order thereunto to give you an accompt of your affaires in Ireland, and more especially of my selfe in relation to them, and other the late transactions. In the possession of the editor.

It hath beene my unhappinesse of late to receive intelligence only from common fame, and very private hands, and to be forced rather to guesse what I had to doe upon all emergencies, then to bee intrusted with the cleere comands of my superiours. By reason whereof, when I first heard the generall rumour of the last parliament's dissolution, and of a likelyhood of discontinuing the government, under which it was called, I having noe light into the intrinsick causes of that action, and knowing in general, how busy the common enemy was in all the three nations, and in what variety of shapes they appeared to act their designs; and withall having the care of securing a more dangerous, numerous, and exasperated people, the Irish natives and Papists; I did forthwith, to answer all the severall ends of my trust, publish a declaration, requiring all officers, civill and military, to attend their respective comands, and not to hearken to any designe of inovation, how speciously soever the same might bee presented unto them. Soone after, I received a letter from the committee of safety, recommending the peace and security of Ireland in a more speciall manner to my care; which I answered with a reall promise of complying with their advice. I did withall communicate that letter to very many officers of the army, promising likewise to transmitt the result of their considerations upon itt; and accordingly I did send over, by three worthy persons of this nation, a particular of such things, as the granting thereof (as is conceived) would much settle the minds of people and army heere, whose case and concernments are very different from those of England or Scotland. All this while I expected directions from his highnes, (by whose authority I was placed heere) still having an eye to the common peace, by preventing all making of partyes and divisions, either among the

A.D. 1659. the people or army; but hearing nothing expressly from him, and yett having credible notice of his acquiescing in what providence had brought forth as to the future government of these nations, I now thinke itt tyme, (least a longer suspence should begett prejudiciall apprehensions in the minds of any) to give you this accompt, viz. that I acquiesse in the present way of government, although I cannot promise soe much affection to the late changes, as others very honestly may. For my owne part, I can say, that I beleive God was present in many of your administrations, before you were last interrupted, and may bee soe againe; to which end I hope, that those worthy persons, who have lately acknowledged such their interrupting you in the yeare 1653 to have beene their fault, will by that fence of their impatience bee henceforth engaged to doe soe noe more, but bee the instruments of your defence, whilst you quietly search out the ways of our peace; which stability and freedome, when the Lord shall restore unto you, will much subdue the hearts of all peaceably minded persons to your authority.

The fower yeares experience I have had of your army heere (even under those tryalls, which have provoked others) gives mee just ground to assure you of their concurrence with their brethren in England, in the way of obeying and defending, rather then of directing or awing you.

I say, for my owne part, I had an honourable opinion of the government you are now returned unto before its discontinuance; and yett I must not deny, but that the free submission, which many worthy, wise, and consciencious persons yeilded to the late government under a single person (by severall wayes aswell reall as verball) satisfied mee alsoe in that forme. And whereas my father, (whom I hope you yett looke upon as noe inconsiderable instrument of these nations freedome and happines) and since him my brother, were constituted cheife in those administrations, and that the returning to another forme hath beene looked upon as an indignity to those my neere relations, I cannot but acknowledg my owne weaknes as to the suddain digesting thereof, and my owne unfitnes to serve you in the carryeing on your further superstructures upon that basis. And as I cannot promote any thing, which inferres the diminution of my late father's honour and meritt, soe I thanke the Lord, for that hee hath kept mee safe in the great temptation, wherewith I have beene assaulted to withdraw my affection from that cause, wherein hee lived and dyed.

I have a tendernes to peace, which (as I conceive depending rather upon the worthinesse of governours then formes of government) renders me content to wait upon providence in the expectation of that mercy; being ready to yeeld up my charge to any, whom you shall send to receive itt; and beseeching the Lord to bee your mighty counsellor and prince of peace, I remaine

Your humble servant,

H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland, to general Fleetwood.

DEAR BROTHER,

In the possession of Will. Cromwell esquire.

I RECEIVED yours of the seventh instant, whereby, and by divers others letters, I take notice of the votes in parliament concerning my coming into England. That news has so many odd circumstances, and such animadversions are made upon it, as I think it much concerns me to know the meaning with all the speed I can. To which purpose I have sent this bearer [Dr. Petty] unto you as one, whom I can best trust, now my nearest concerns are at stake. Wherefore I desire you to shew your kindness to me in being free and plain with him, as to such advice as you think concerns my preservation, (for I am well contented to aim at nothing else) and especially how I shall behave myself in reference to the summons for my coming over, when I receive them. I have made so good use of my time, as I have not money to bring me. Pray give the bearer access to you, upon my account; he does not use to be tedious or impertinent. It concerns me to have one, that I can trust, to have such an access to you. I hope you will not look upon him, as to me, under the character and representation, that St. Hierom Sankey and some others may give of him; but rather as one, that hath been faithfull and affectionate unto me, and, I may say, unto yourselfe also, and one, who I think, notwithstanding all that is said, is a very honest man. I shall not trouble you with much more. He can best acquaint you with what concerns myself, upon which single account I have gotten him to come for England. As for the public differences, I never perceived him forward or busy in any. Dear brother, these are times of tryall, both as to our own hearts and our friends. I hope you will well consider of what you advise me as to myself, and let me have a speedy return of your opinion.

I desire

I desire the Lord to teach us his ways, and to fitt our hearts for that condition, where- A.D. 1659.
with we have not been enough acquainted.

I have sent the letter, which I intended to have sent the house, along with the army's address, before I received the news of my being sent for. You will see the reality of my heart therein. Let it be read, or the substance thereof more privately communicated, as you shall think fitt upon the place.

H. Cromwell, lord lieutenant of Ireland, to general Fleetwood.

DEAR BROTHER,

I RECEIVED yours of the seventh of June, and the advices therein, which being In the possession of Will. Cromwell esq;
but generall, I have sent Dr. Petty to know more particularly what you would have me do. Upon the first rumor I sett out a proclamation to keep the peace, when I heard the parliament was sitting; and withall that their call was from some of the army; and that not many appeared; and that the committee of officers of severall interests kept up their meeting.

We dispatcht from hence some, that might acquaint you with the desires of those here. I have since his highness acquiescence called together the officers, to make such addressses as they should think fitt. For my own part, I know no harm in a commonwealth way of government; and beleive those now at helm to be very able and fitt for their work: yet you may think, I cannot but be troubled at what has so lately befallen my relations; and do acknowledge, that others may very honestly do what I cannot so handsomely. I have resisted great temptations, in respect to their authority. The late news of my being sent for has strange interpretations put on it by some; and I am distracted with the variety of mens opinions upon it. I desire you to let me know, how you would have me carry it, when the order itself comes to my hands. The officers are at worke about their addresss. I lett them take their own course, that the parliament may have the true knowledge of them. They are all well disposed to settlement. Lett me hear speedily from you. I am, &c.

Mr. John Barwick to king Charles II.

May it please your MAJESTY,

SINCE my last I humbly acknowledge the receipt of two from your sacred majesty of In the possession of Joseph Radcliffe, of the Inner Temple, esq;
the second and twelfth instant; and I have been, and shall be allwayes most ready (to my utmost power) to observe and perform all your majesty's commands. 459 126 105 4

When occasion serves, I shall render your majesty a faithful account 562 92 305 51 upon it, or 190 30 143 in order to it.

For the other two busineses, whereof I gave your majesty an account 73 536 42 30 with him. What I wrote concerning 117 12 289 (his other brother-in-law) was only upon his report; for they were desirous to debate the matter between themselves alone.

All that I can say, is, that I have known 117 10 289 for several years past, and have allwayes found him to be a civill and sober person, and not prodigall of his expreffions; which gives me the better hopes of him. Note, there will be no need of pressing him with his promise; yet I have written to my freind to mynde him of it, when he writes to him, which he doth frequently on other occasions. All that troubles me is, that I he is still in town;

In the posses-

 Radcliffe, of the Inner Temple esq.

THE various reports of our affaires, which you meet with in letters from hence, proceed from a ground, which I hope will excuse both my former saylings, and present barreness in matter of newes. We are suffered to know nothing, that can be concealed on one side; and when it comes out, it gets such a tincture from the genius of the relater, as often distracts us with contrarieties, and makes us write what we hope or fear rather than what is true.

What the letters told you of H. Cromwell's defiance and submission, was not true in either particular. He hath hitherto stood in aequilibrio, taking no notice at all of the parliament, as the supreme authority, (as they call it) but proceeding on in his former course, as if his brother were still protector. He is neither so active as he might be, to play his own game, nor so plyable as they would have him here to comply with theirs.
 And his dullness is the more inexcusable, because he has all the encouragement he can desire to shake it off. The common soldiers and inferior officers of his army are very great zealots against the Anabaptists. The people of Ireland generally are against his submitting to the parliament: the nobility and gentry are willing to make up his army to 20,000;

20,000; and the city of Dublin alone proper to pay 2000 of them. All this I am told by A.D. 1659.

a very sober and discreet person, who heard it from 470 103 2 187, who was there the ninth instant; and yet, notwithstanding all this, he was then very pendulous, which way to take. It is true, indeed, he had not then heard of the rejecting of his message, nor of his being voted out of the government, nor of his being sent for hither. And how those may work upon him, this relater knowes not; but otherwise he suspected the worst as to his own inclination. But for all that, he is of opinion, a good game may thereby be played, if things be well managed, though he should doe as his brother did. The greatest obstruction is from some great officers in that army, who have got into estates there, and are promised from hence I know not what acts of parliament, to confirm their title; and by these they have constant intelligence here, how all things stand there. This is all I can safely relate as to that kingdom. If I should swallow the flying reports, I could tell you better newes thence; and it is certain, that H. Cromwell's last letter does not please them at Westminster. And the same may be sayd for the last letter from Monk. And that, which adds to the discontent, is, (as I am told) that both of them harp upon one string (which makes them suspected of some understanding each of other); they are both for having all the members received into the house, that sate in it in 48.

Another thing, that is here disliked in the Scottish army, is that they will take no more commissions, nor suffer any officers of it to be layd aside, though Talbot and Daniell were here designed for it. Monk is afraid it will come up higher in time; and it is thought he would shew himself more sensible then he does of Fleetwood's being placed over him, if it were not for a great bank of money he hath here, which they know of, and in whos hand it is.

We hear nothing of certainty concerning Montague; but there is some reason to believe he carries no affections towards the men of Westminster: for as they have eased him of his regiment of horse, so hath he lately given order for the selling of some very good horses, which he had here.

It is no great wonder things at this distance should be so uncertain, for they are not much clearer at home. If my conjecture were worth the hearing, I should not stick to say, there is still a mystery in working, which perhaps may appear in time. The grand faction is now driven between the republicans and fifth-monarchy-men; and the former have outvoted the latter, both in the house and councill of officers. These were the men, that first took their commissions from the parliament; which the other seeing they would doe, used the common policy of swimming in the stream. Of late they receive in all the sublimated saints into the army, which Pride and some others cashiered; and there is talk of an underhand list of 7000 men upon the fifth-monarchy account. It is so reported by some of that party; whether in reality or vaunt, I know not. If the former, then all those persons, which flock so fast to London, under pretence of petitioning against tythes, may possibly have another errand. The truth will appear in time.

Guilt and gain have been the two cords, that have tyed them together a long time. The later is now come to saveing what they have got. They say, Fleetwood will be content with 40 s. a day, though this pay should be 10 l. to teach others the lesson of self-denyall, and to husband their money the better. Their witts are now all at work how to raise money: there is no stone, which they turn not over; which makes them become odious even to their friends. The penalties voted against new honours granted by the king, are stretched to the mock-honours granted by the protector; and all salaries granted by him to any persons, that were not wont to receive such salaries out of the exchequer, must be refunded. The judges, perhaps, may escape; but they of his councill, &c. must be squeezed. Tichborn is mad at this, and the mayor not much better.

The members are so divided, as (one of them sayes) there are not six of one mynd; and the army is not much better united, if it were not for the common cause, that is, guilt. If they can get in all the members that sate in 48, it is thought there will be a great alteration; for then those, that were immediately guilty of the king's blood, will be much the lesser party; and I am told those, that are not so guilty, would be well content to bring in the rest to preserve themselves from that ruin, which they see their divisions and God's justice may possibly bring upon them. And this being the case, the wisest men, that I meet with here, are much reserved in their judgement, what would most advance his majesty's interest at this time. If his party can appear effectually, it is hoped the enemy will strive who shall first make their peace. If but slenderly, it is feared they will thereby be the more firmly united: if not at all, yet it is still conceived they will shatter of themselves by subdivisions. And indeed those, that pretend to a judgment in matters of that nature, say, that since the government was last thrown off the hinges, it received such a shatter, as nothing they can do can repair it, till it returns into the right channell, unless a faint opposition unite them in themselves. I beseech God direct his majesty what to doe in this case. June 21. 1659.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

SINCE my last of the 14th instant by the ordinary post, I have received one from your honors of the second of the same, brought by Compton; whereby I am impowered to continue in my negotiation betwixt the two kings, as formerly. I return your honors most humble thanks for doing me the right to judg of me, as in truth I am, faithful to the interests of the commonwealth; and shal make it my earnest endeavour, not onely to acquit myself faithful, but to render myself useful, in whatever trust shal be committed to me.

The time of the three weeks limited by the treatie at the Hague is expired; but no accomodement betwixt the two crownes effected, his majestie of Denmark having possitively refused to enter upon a particular treatie with Sweden; but insists upon comprehension of al his allies in a general peace; so that by the letter of the said treatie his majestie of Denmark is the refuser, and not to be assisted during the refuse. I have remonstrated as much to the Dutch ambassadors, who are at accord with me hereupon, and have wrot accordingly to their admirals. Whither they wil conform or no, I cannot say; for I perceive they act not by concert with their ambassadors. 'Tis feared De Ruyter will goe directly with his fleet for Copenhagen, to put ashoar his 4000 landmen. He and Opdam joined the fifteenth instant in the great Belt, which was five daies sooner then the time limited, according to the interpretation of their own ambassadors, accounting from the notification of the treaty to Opdam. Upon this junction Opdam is admiral, Jan Everrton vice-admiral, De Ruyter rere-admiral, according to the custome of the provinces; first a Hollander, then a Zalander, then a Hollander. Opdam has committed several contraventions to the treatie about five dayes since. He intercepted a smal barque laden from hence with powder and other munition, bound for Funene.

Rixadmiral Wrangel is very strong upon that isle, and in condition to receive the enemy, in case he attempts to land there. Fifteen Swedish men of war set sail lately for the little Belt, to carry the rixadmiral a reinfort of foot. About Eblen they rencontred two Hollanders, who presently upon sight of the Swedish fleet stranded themselves; and one of them set fire to himself. This may possibly beget some dispute, and yet the Swede, as I am certainly informed, never made shot at them, his majestie having given peremptorie orders, not to begin any hostility upon the Dutch.

I am privately informed from Copenhagen, that some overtures have beene made with the Dutch ambassadors there, of a stricter alliance with Denmark; and that the Dane has offered the Dutch Wensussel in the North of Jutland; 'tis thought also Gluckstadt upon the Elve, besides great priviledges in Copenhagen, as to trade and inhabitation, together with two suffrages in the senate. It much imports England to be well assured, whether the states mean and act sincerely in this propounded mediation of peace.

General Montagu is with the fleet about Callinburg, and was three daies since about a league and half from the Dutch fleete, which, accounting some merchant-men, amounted to eighty sail. I dispatched away Compton to him over land with his letters. I expect every day the plenipotentiarys, who, as I am informed, are to come from England, hoping their arrival will facilitate this difficult work. At present we are here at a grand pause upon his majesty of Denmark's refusal of a separate treaty. Here is as yet no French minister in this court; but Mons. de Terlon, who was formerly joint mediator with me on the part of France in the treaty of Roschild, is expected daily from Dantzick. It would not be amiss, that some instruction were given, whether the ministers of England shall yield him presedent.

I find his majesty very much troubled at the advice given him out of England by his ministers, as if some commissioners of the council, upon conference with them, should propound the cession of Drontheim and Bornholm to the Dane; which this king will never condescend to, as long as he has a sword by his side, and a soldier behind him.

No advancement is made in the intended treaty with Poland: the Swedish ambassadors are still at Stettin. They have been these four months cal'd up, in expectation of safe conducts in due form; but the Pole still commits one wilfull mistake after another, only to protract time; by which it is easy to collect he has the same aim in his eye with the Dane, viz. A general peace, or a confederate war. 'Tis sayd in the last letter from those parts, that the treaty with the Cossagues is ratified by the dyet at Warsaw; which, if true, is very considerable; and we may expect to hear shortly of a great army in Pruss. This is al at present from Friday, June 24. 1659.

At the council of state at Whitehall,

Ordered,

THAT the committee of the council, appointed to confer with the lord embassador of Vol. lxiv. the United Provinces, do treat and confer with him, P. 239.

1. Concerning the form of the ratification of the treaty at the Hague, which this state is both to give and receive from the states of the United Provinces.

2. Concerning the desisting from giving assistance by either commonwealth to the kings of Sweden or Denmark, for the three weeks after the expiration of the first three weeks mentioned in the said treaty at the Hague, whether the same will be strictly and punctually observed on the part of the lords the states general of the United Provinces, their fleets, and public ministers, according to the agreement here made by the said embassador.

3. Concerning the joint concurrence of these two states, to constrain the two Northern kings to a peace, upon the grounds of the treaty at Roscheild, and according to the former conferences with the said embassador, to ascertain the particular thereof here, as far as may be, to prevent differences, that may arise thereupon in the Sound.

To the right honourable the council of state, by authority of the parliament of the commonwealth of England.

1. THE subscribed embassador of the lords the states general of the United Provinces, Vol. lxiv. having perused the council's order, bearing date the 24th of this instant, St. Angl. P. 243. doth on the first point, concerning the act of ratification, assure their honours, that as soon as the two acts of the said ratification will be presented at the Hague, this state will receive back again two other acts of ratification, or at the least that of the said lords the states general of the United Provinces.

2. To the second point the said embassador declareth, that the lords his superiors have given such orders to their public ministers and commanders in chief in the Sound, that it will appear, that they do act bona fide, observing the treaty and agreement.

3. To the third, concerning the joint concurrence of the commonwealth of England, and the state of the United Provinces, to re-establish a peace betwixt the two Northern kings and kingdoms, the said embassador doth assure their honours, that the lords his superiors are of the same opinion, that it is necessary to ascertain the particulars, which are not determined by the said treaty made at the Hague on the $\frac{1}{2}$ th of May last past. And according to the orders and instructions sent over to the said embassador by the lords his superiors, he offers the following particulars in the name and on the behalf of the same:

On consideration of the inestimable losses suffered and sustained by the king of Denmark, first, by the delay of the evacuation of his territories, contrary to the agreement made at Roschield, and afterwards by the new and inconvenient breach of that treaty, and the continual devastations, oppressions, and almost a general destruction of the territories, which did remain by the said treaty in the possession of the said king of Denmark; the said lords the states general have all along in the conferences at the Hague, and by the said embassador here represented, that they did conceive, that it would be convenient, that endeavours were used on the behalf of the concurring and co-operating states, to settle the peace betwixt the two Northern kings, upon the grounds of the treaty made at Bromsebro, anno 1645, or as near it as would be practicable, that thereby the king of Denmark might in some measure be able to balance the great power of Sweden. And therein they do not only find a great deal of justice, but conceive, that it is also the true interest of England, as well as of the state of the United Provinces. However, the said lords the states general do hold it absolutely just and reasonable, that Drontheim with its appurtenances, as also the isle of Bornholm, (the subjects and inhabitants whereof have by a singular demonstration of affection and fidelity reduced themselves under the government and obedience of the king of Denmark) should remain in his possession; and that all other promises, which have been

A.D. 1659. extorted since the said treaty of Roschild, as the 400,000 rixdollars, for some pretensions of losses sustained during the war in Guinea, and that the little isle of Ween should belong to Schonen, should be annulled and extinguished. If it please the supreme authority of the commonwealth of England to ascertain the same particulars, and to procure, that on the behalf of Sweden the treaty of Elbing, with the elucidations mentioned in the said treaty concluded at the Hague, be ratified and accomplished, (as well for the good and advantage of England and of the state of the United Provinces, as of the other included parties) there will remain no discrepancies betwixt the public ministers, in loco at least, not betwixt those of the commonwealth of England, and those of the United Provinces. And the said lords the states general are willing to oblige themselves, and to give sufficient orders and instructions, in pursuance of the aforesaid particulars, to their extraordinary commissioners sent to the kings of Sweden and Denmark, to agree with the commissioners and plenipotentiaries of the commonwealth of England there in loco, in such a manner, that they shall not only withdraw from the king, who shall refuse such a peace, their succours, and give and send him no other, but that they will powerfully assist the acceptant against the refusant, till he shall be brought to reason.

This $\frac{7 \text{ July}}{27 \text{ June}}$ 1659.

WIL. NIEUPOORT.

The answer of the council of state appointed by authority of parliament, to a paper exhibited by his excellency the lord ambassador of the lords the states general of the United Provinces, of the $\frac{7 \text{ July}}{27 \text{ June}}$, 1659.

Vol. lxiv.
p. 249.

1. TO the first particular mentioned in the said paper, that the form of the ratification of the treaty at the Hague, which this state is to give (being agreed unto) two acts of ratification thereof by the parliament, will be sent to the Hague, the one to be delivered to the ambassador from the king of France, upon his delivery of an act of ratification of the said treaty from his majesty of France in like form to this state; and the other to be delivered to the lords the states general of the United Provinces, upon the said states general delivery of their act of ratification of the said treaty in like form to this state.

2. To the second particular, that the council do conceive the lord ambassador's answer to intend a satisfaction to what was proposed in the second head of the council's last paper of the 24th of June instant, treated upon by their committee with the said ambassador; and that by observing the treaty and agreement on the part of the lords the states general, their public ministers and commanders in the Sound, is intended, that the ships of the United Provinces do forbear to give any aid or assistance to, or use any act of hostility against either of the two Northern kings, not only for the three weeks mentioned in the treaty at the Hague, but also for other three weeks immediately following the expiration of the former three weeks, in like sort as the fleet of this commonwealth are directed to do, and as agreed between this council and his excellency. And the council do desire, if this be not the full meaning of his said excellency's answer, that it may be further explained.

3. To the third particular, That this state find no reason to depart from the treaty at Roschild (consented to by the treaty at the Hague) to be the ground of a peace between the two Northern kings; but do insist thereupon, and upon the ascertaining of such things here, in order to that peace, as may be matter of difference between the public ministers of these commonwealths upon the place, and may not be sufficiently provided for, or not fully determined by the treaty at the Hague: and do therefore propose, that as to any places gained, or loss sustained by either of the two kings, since the treaty at Roschild, these commonwealths do by their public ministers upon the place co-operate and intermediate for an agreement therein between the said kings, according to justice, and honour, and the interest of these commonwealths. But if it shall so happen, that the said kings shall not be brought to an agreement therein upon terms of accommodation between them, other than are provided for in the said treaty at Roschild, that then the public ministers and fleets of these commonwealths shall co-operate for the obtaining a peace between the said two Northern kings, upon the treaty at Roschild; and that all places gained by, or delivered or surrendered to either of the said kings from the other; since the said treaty at Roschild, be re-delivered, and remain in the right and possession of that king, in whose possession they were, or ought to be, according to the said treaty at Roschild; and that the public ministers of both these commonwealths do likewise co-operate for the obtaining of necessary, equal, and like advantages and security for these commonwealths, in point of navigation, trade, and commerce from the king of Denmark, and for the procuring from the king of Sweden, that the treaty of Elbing with the elucidations be ratified so as may be for the equal advantage of both these commonwealths, and for the benefit of the other included parties; and that the fleets and ships of both A.D. 1659. these commonwealths do withdraw their assistance and countenance from that king, that shall not consent to the aforesaid terms, and actually assist that king, that shall accept thereof. June 28th, 1659.

Lord Lambert,

Sir Robert Honywood, and

Col. Berry, or any two of them, to deliver this answer to the Dutch ambassador, and confer with him thereupon, and make report to the council.

Mr. Ph. Meadowe to the council of state.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

I CONTINUE to advise every weeke the state of things from these parts, albeit I Vol. lxi. heare of none, that corresponds with me from England on the part of your honours. P. 251. Le chevalier de Terlon, the French ambassador, he, who formerly signed and sealed together with me the late treaty of Roschild, is lately arrived here from Dantzick; so that now we are only in expectation of the commissioners from England, whose long stay, and my want of necessary orders in the mean time, has caused great retardment to the common affair. I know not, whether upon their arrival I am to be joined in the same commission with them; if not, I hope your honors, in consideration of my long service, wil grant me a favourable recal.

Gen. Mountagu has received the orders for the prolongation of the neutralitie for three weeks longer, but has had much to doe to bring general Opdam to a conformity thereto; yet at last he has engaged himself to observe the third article of their treaty at the Hague, according to the time agreed by M. Nieuport; onely with this restriction, provided he receive not in the mean time other orders from his master. But I feare he wil reckon the time from the notification of the treatie to gen. Mountagu; and according to that account, there are not above seven daies in being, before the last three weeks will be expired, which is a very short time for a very long worke. I have propounded a further prolongation to the Dutch ambassadors heer, for a week or fortnight longer; but I perceive they decline the proposition, and are willing to retain a freedome to act as they see occasion; so that I suppose the 4000 land-men upon the fleet wil be transported to Copenhagen, and some other assistances given before any entrie be made upon the treatie. And yet I find a very good disposition in this court, to give al reasonable content and satisfaction to the states general, not only in according them the Elbing treaty, but in reference also to a peace with Denmark, and the elector of Brandenburg. And because the king of Denmark insists upon the inclusion of his allies, and wil not hearken to a separate treatie, his majestie of Sweden, to demonstrate his readines to a peace, has declared himself willing, as heretofore to a particular treatie with Denmark, so now to an universal treaty, in order to a general peace. The original declaration I send herewith, enclosed as it was delivered me by his majestie's order under his seale.

Opdam with his and the Danish fleet are returned for Copenhagen. De Ruyter continues in the Belt. Gen. Mountagu is returned from before Callinburg to the Sound, and is at present at an anchor betwixt the isle of Huen and Copenhagen. I shal not willingly misrepresent any thing, but my intelligence from Copenhagen much failes me, if the Dutch doe not treat underhand for themselves with that king. This is all at present from Vos igitur, illustrissimi domini, enixe clementissimus princeps meus rogatum venit, quo cum vestri jam ad reconciliandam pacem in fretum Sundanum abierint illustres domini legati, pro vestra benevolentia serenitas sua assistere, in delata sibi justa possessione tueri, eoque respicere pro vestra auctoritate velitis, ut ingentia illata damna sibi refarciantur, quique adhuc nuperis tractatibus restant pertractandi articuli, bonum exitum fortiantur. Mr. Ph. Meadows to the council of state.

RIGHT HONORABLE,

Vol. lxxv.

THE long stop, which hath been put to my negotiation, through defect of requisite orders, neither having commission nor creditives to the two kings, suitable to a mediation, has been a great obstruction to the intended peace; so that things remaining in silence and without action, I have little at present to communicate to your honors. Three daies since the French ambassador, myself, and the ambassadors of the states general, went from hence half the way to Copenhagen, with intention to meet the other ambassadors of the states residing in the court of Denmark, in order to concert business betwixt us in conformitie to the treatie at the Hague; but they failed to give us the meeting. Whereupon the next day we went to the camp before Copenhagen, with the same purpose; but they still pretended supposed difficulties, whereby to excuse their not coming out to us: whereby 'tis easy to judg, they in Copenhagen doe not act in all things by concert with their colleagues here; and I have reason to think they have received different orders from their superiors.

Notwithstanding his majestie of Denmark has absolutely refused to treat separately with this king, yet the assistance from the states general is nevertheles retarded. Opdam and Bielk the Danish admiral came into the rood before Copenhagen two daies since with 34 men of war. Several merchant-men laden with provisions came along with them. De Ruyter comes in this day with 46 more; so that the 4000 land-men will be speedily disembarked; and if they have a sufficient number of mariners for manning and equipping some of his majesty of Denmark's great ships, which lie up in port, which I suppose they they will have, they will be in capacitie, being joined together, to put forth to sea, in case A.D. 1659. of need, with an hundred able men of war. Al that his majesty of Sweden can do, is to retire with his ships into several ports, and so put himself upon the defensive. Gen. Mountagu continues with his fleet in the former port betwixt Huen and Copenhagen.

His majestie of Denmark, when in a weak and low condition, refused a separate treatie with Sweden; which he wil much les consent to now, having received the supply of so considerable a strength. I have often urged upon the Dutch ambassadors the fourth article of the treatie at the Hague, by which they are obliged not to assist him, who shal refuse a just and reasonable peace. Now he, who refuses to treat, as the king of Denmark does, refuses a peace, upon what conditions soever. Al they have to reply upon me is, that that article supposes the three estates to have employed their utmost diligence and endeavor for an accomodement; which they allege is not yet performed on the part of England and France. The French ambassador is going to Copenhagen within a day or two. I should long since have been there, had I received my creditives from the parlement.

The Austrians and Brandenburgers, about ten daies since, made an attempt upon Funen, but were repulsed with considerable los. There is an eminent officer amongst them slain; who it is, is not yet certainly known, but supposed to be major-gen. Goltz. Probably the next thing they will be upon, wil be to transport cavalerie for Copenhagen, and so dispute the campagne upon this isle with his majestie of Sweden, who wil find himself in difficult circumstances, singly to oppose a numerous enemy in so many places. As for a peace, I look upon it as a case almost desperate, the most advantageous opportunities for obtaining it being now past; and our fleet must shortly look homewards, unles timely supplies come out of England. The Hollanders in the mean time wil carry al before them in Denmark, and possibly at last force his majestie of Sweden too upon such conditions, as may be gainful to themselves, but prejudicial to England.

I have long expected the arrival of the commissioners plenipotentiaries. When arrived, I shall readily communicate with them at large the whole state of affairs heer; and then, unles I have power to act with them in the same commission, my longer stay heer wil be wholly useles; and therefore shal wait and hope your honors commands to be recalled to some other employment, wherein I may be in capacitie to render myself in some measure serviceable: which is the sole ambition of

AT my arrival from Dixmuyde I have received that letter you honoured me withal, Vol. lxx. p. 7. and at night I have not failed of executing your orders in sending out a party all night, which hath taken nothing. I have also sent out a lieutenant in the enemy's army, who could learn nothing of their design: but there are arrived four or five regiments Irish of the troops of the king of England, and the guards and the equipage of the marquis of Caracena. Monf. de Marfin and many other principal officers are gone to Brussels. It is conjectured, that the king of England and Monf. de Caracena must join this army; one party whereof is yet in our Chattolome hard by Nieuport. Our horsemen have subsistence according to those of Ypres, as his highness of Turenne hath ordered it; that is, seven livres a day each captain; proportionally four sous a day for each trooper. I humbly intreat you to believe, that I will have all my life-time that obedience I owe to your commandments. I have the honour and advantage to be Furnes, 15. July, 1659.

THE major being gone this morning for Dixmuyde, hath received of the expresse that letter you writ to him, who hath told me to be pressed for his return; which hath obliged me to open the said paquet, to know the subject of his voyage; and meeting

A.D. 1659. with that letter you wrote to Mr. Fournier, I answered: and of me you shall have, Sir, that four regiments of foot are joined to Monf. de Marfin, which we believe are troops of the duke of York. I am assured this morning, that Monf. de Marfin is gone post haste to Bruffels. You shall have advice of what I shall learn more; and we shall do here what you shall find fit. The master shall be here this night back; and I am with respects,

Your most humble and obedient servant,

Du FRESNE.

The horse here hath the same subsistence as those of Ypres.

SIR,

Vol. lxxv. p. 8.

BEING ready to take horse to go towards the strand, I have received those you have honoured me withal, and will not fail to-night to send a party, as you desire; of which I will not fail to advise you. One of the magistrates told me this morning, that the duke of York should come with his troops within a league of this place; but since we are of contrary belief. The lantmaster of this place came the other day from the army of Monf. Marfin, who saith, that there was expected some free company, amongst which the blue-cloaks, which are the company of the life-guards. If any thing worthy of your note passeth, we shall not omit to let you know, being

SIR,

Vol. lxxv. p. 8.

IN Monf. de Marfin's absence, I have opened the answers you have written to him, that are sent to him from Bruffels, by which word is sent him, that the troops are sent this way, to fortify the sea-coasts against the English, with whom we have wars; and that this in no manner derogates from the suspension of arms. If you find any thing to say to it, Sir, I assure myself, addressing yourself to his excellence the marquis of Caracena, who is governor of these Low-countries, you shall receive full satisfaction, knowing that Monf. Marfin had promised you to make you participant of what he should know. I would not defer to advise, and make use of this opportunity to let you know, that I am,

The commissioners at Dunkirk to the council of state.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Vol. lxxv.
p. 193.

SINCE our arrival at this place, we have applied ourselves to the discharge of the trust reposed in us; and having spoken both to officers and soldiers, we find their minds much settled by what we have told them concerning the parliament, and your honours resolution to take care of them and this place. We have viewed the fortifications of the town, and judge, that they are of good strength, being sufficiently manned to oppose any force, that can ordinarily be expected to come against them. There is some part of the outworks unfinished, which will require some time and money. We have also taken notice of the fort of Mardike, and it is our opinion, and the officers upon this place, that the fort, as it now is, will not be able to hold out, if an enemy should come against it; and therefore it is thought more convenient to slight it, than to let it fall into the hands of an enemy. The three regiments, that were in the French army, lie at present in tents, near the walls of this town. The French commissary doth as yet provide for them. The officers are very desirous to know the parliament's pleasure concerning them, in regard they are uncertain of their provision from France. And we humble desire, that a constant supply of money may be made for this place, which will be one great means to preserve it. We leave these things to your honours consideration, and remain,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Your most humble and obedient servants.

The

The commissioners at Dunkirk to general Fleetwood.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

WE did, in our last, give you a brief account of our being arrived at this place, and A.D. 1659. of the state of things, as they then stood, which is not since worse, but better; officers and soldiers at least seemingly well settled, and nothing is like to discompose them but want: therefore, whatever you do with the forces in England, if you will keep this town, the garrison must be well paid, and well stored with provisions necessary. We have given an account to the council touching Mardike, wherein we have offered it as our advice, that the sooner it be slighted, the better, it being impossible to keep it four days against an army; and the loss of that place will prove very dangerous, if not destructive, to this place. Here does want a person to command this garrison, whose principle it is to encourage godliness in the power of it. We have cause to fear, that profaneness and wickedness (which do sadly abound in this place) will do more to the loss and prejudice thereof, than all other enemies. We wish the change of one of our honest English regiments for one of the worst of these here, and a good governor, as the best expedient. We humbly submit it to your excellency, craving pardon for giving you this trouble, commending you to the grace and guidance of the Lord, that you may comfortably be carried through that work he hath intrusted you with. This is, and shall be, the prayer of, &c.

From count Schomberg.

SIR,

AT the same instant I received yours, I was sending away my secretary to advise you from me of the things contained both in the letter of the enemies, as in that of the commander of Furnes, of which he will entertain you; and you may believe and give credit in every thing. But as your letter advises me of a sad accident, of which I am wholly sensible, I'll tell you, that I send a guard by express to Mons. d'Avignon, and to the commander of St. Croix, of which my secretary will shew the letters, that to-morrow they may send to fetch the trooper, that you have taken, and that you may exempt him and also of the consorts. I intreat you only to cause to be made a copy, as soon as can be possible, and that in French, of the informations, that the guard may carry with him, as I request of the particular justice. I desire, that the business may be ended as soon as may be, and that the sentence of the council of war should be made known before the execution, that you may send some officer to witness the execution, that shall be done. Intreating you to believe, that this business troubles me as much as you can be, and that you cannot have more care of the interest, than that glories to take,

SIR,

Your most humble and most obedient servant,

Berghe, 18. July, 1659.

SCHOMBERG.

I humbly kiss the commissioners hands.

A translation of a letter from Mons. Talon, intendant of the French king, unto the governors of Dunkirk, dated in Wenen, the 19th July, 1659. [N. S.]

SIR,

I HAVE received the two letters, which you have done me the honour to write unto me, and have sent to Mons. the marquis of Caracena for to know, whether he doth not understand, that the town of Dunkirk and Mardike are comprised in the cessation of arms, as other places; and I do expect the answer, for to let you know it. In the mean time I shall request you to send me the resolution, which you shall have from England, touching the war at sea.

You have done very well in having caused the king's English troops, which were at Bourbourg, to advance towards Dunkirk. If you need all those of his majesty for the preservation of Dunkirk, you shall always find them ready; and I had advanced towards you myself, had I not believed, that I should be more useful to you here, in observing the enemy; but when you have need, spare me not. The advice, which I gave you, and which I had from England, is most true; and the enemy do cover their design with the

A.D. 1659. name of the king of England, unto whom Mons. Marfin is lieutenant-general. I am, without any reserve, and on all trials,

SIR,

Your most humble servant,

TALON.

The Dutch ambassador to the council of state.

To the right honourable the council of state, appointed by the authority of the parliament of the commonwealth of England.

Vol. lxx.
p. 207.

THE lords the states general of the United Netherland Provinces, having seriously perused the answer to a paper exhibited by the subscribed ambassador of the said United Provinces on the ^{7th} of July, 1659. ^{27th} of June, have sent over express order and instruction to their said ambassador, that he should labour with all possible care and diligence, to the end that the supreme authority of the commonwealth of England (seeing how sincerely the said lords the states general do co-operate and concur with the said commonwealth of England for the obtaining of a peace between the two Northern kings and kingdoms) would be pleased to consider impartially, and without prejudice, the present constitution, and the case of the said kings and kingdoms; and then it will appear, that, in the year 1645. the Swedes have gotten from Denmark the whole maritime province of Holland, besides the two islands of Gothland and Oesell, the greatest and fruitfulest in the Baltic sea, and kept in their possession from the then prince, and now king, of Denmark, his two archbishopricks of Bremen and Verden, being very considerable countries in Germany, betwixt the rivers the Elbe and the Weser: that the Swedes have since, in February, 1658. gotten from Denmark the provinces of Bleking and Schonen, with the country and the impregnable fortrefs of Balmys in the kingdom of Norway, besides Drontheim and the isle of Bornholm. By which great addition of power to the one, and the extraordinary of the other, the balance and the counterpoise between the Northern kings and kingdoms (which hath been very prudently always maintained by the states and princes interested in the preservation of the liberty and just freedom of the navigation and commerce in the Baltic sea, and the East countries) is quite brought down.

Therefore, and in consideration of many pregnant reasons and motives, have the said lords the states general always particularly propounded it in the conferences at the Hague between the two public ministers and their commissioners, that the last treaty of peace having been performed by the king of Denmark, and violated by the king of Sweden, that it would be just and equitable, that the peace should be made and re-established on the foundation of the treaty at Bromsbroo in the aforesaid year 1645. But finding that the oppressed king of Denmark was so unfortunate, that England and France could not be prevailed with to condescend thereunto, they insisted, that at least a just and reasonable medium and expedient might be agreed on, whereby the king of Denmark might be restored in a condition, that he might at least subsist as a king in some measure, and not remain altogether exposed to the mercy of his adversary. And after several debates in many conferences, it was at last agreed and concluded, that the three states should use their endeavours, that a sincere, firm peace might be settled between the said kings, upon the foundation and basis of the said treaty of Roschild, but with a reservatory clause in the latter part of the second article, that the losses sustained by reason of the renewing of the war should be taken into consideration; and that endeavours should be used for the composing of all differences between the said kings, and the bringing of them, as far as possible, into mutual amity. And truly it is not the office and duty of impartial mediators to endeavour, that the one party, especially assailing and oppressing, should carry all before him, and allow or make no satisfaction for the mischief and devastation unjustly by him committed, and that the other party assaulted and oppressed should be left in a sad and wholly broken state and condition. If not only the reason and equity, but the true aim and intrinsic intention of the said treaty at the Hague be well and truly considered, it is manifest, that the meaning hath been, that all the territories and places should be restored to the king of Denmark, according to the said treaty of Roschild; that is, in such a condition as they were at the time of the conclusion of the said treaty; which being impossible to perform in such a manner by the king of Sweden, (whose armies and forces have wasted, destroyed, burnt, and otherwise quite ruined the said territories and places of Denmark, to the utmost undoing of the king, gentry, and people of the said kingdom of Denmark, first by the continuing upon free-quarters in the said countries many months after the time of the evacuation agreed on by the said treaty, and afterwards, in a more intolerable manner by the unjust, new breach of that treaty, and the hostile invasion of Denmark)

Denmark) it is altogether just and reasonable, that the same should be made good and supplied by an equivalent; which equivalent cannot be found more conveniently, than by leaving or quitting to the king of Denmark Drontheim, with its appurtenances, and the isle of Bornholm, (which are both reduced, by the singular fidelity of the people thereof, under the power and obedience of the king of Denmark) and by remitting the payment of four hundred thousand rixdollars, which were pretended for some losses sustained by the Swedes on the coast of Guiney during the war; and the said promise was by force of arms extorted since the conclusion of the said treaty of Roschild, and since that, on the behalf of Denmark, all the articles of that treaty had been performed and accomplished; and that likewise the little isle of Ween might remain under Zeland, and not be annexed unto Schonen.

The said lords the states general cannot persuade themselves, that the present parliament of the commonwealth of England (so wonderfully restored to the government of the three united nations) will think it fit, that there should be a difference and discrepancy between them and the United Netherland Provinces about or concerning the said four particulars; or that they would endeavour to force and compel the said oppressed king of Denmark to surrender his faithful subjects in Drontheim and Bornholm aforesaid to that king, who doth look on the said fidelity as a crime committed against his majesty, which he would doubtless resent against the same. And how is it imaginable, that a Christian prince, having any conscience, or sense of honour and natural affection, can be induced to abandon his faithful people, who having, with the hazard of their lives and fortunes, cast off a foreign power, have reduced themselves under the obedience of their own and natural prince?

The lords the states general do no-ways doubt, but that the commonwealth of England, remembering how unreasonably the Swedes did raise the tolls at Drontheim the last year, when they were possessed thereof, will hold themselves as well concerned and interested in the commerce and navigation to Drontheim aforesaid, and the other ports of Norway, as the said United Provinces, the rates and proportion of the tolls being equally regulated there by treaties for both the states and nations.

The said lords the states general, to manifest and to shew abundantly on their behalf their sincere and hearty affection to promote and further the before-mentioned peace, have ordered, that he the said ambassador should assure and declare in their name, and on their behalf, to the parliament, and council of state appointed by the authority of the same, that in case it be mutually agreed on to obtain the said four points, being so just and equitable, that the said lords the states general do uprightly and firmly bind and oblige themselves, not only to endeavour, that the king of Denmark do desist from his alleged exceptions, and do condescend to the treaty, but also to help effectually to bring his majesty to accept of the peace on the restitution and evacuation of his countries, according to the treaty of Roschild, leaving out of the same the third article, as it is agreed in the second article of the said treaty at the Hague; provided that the supreme authority of the commonwealth of England be likewise, in regard of Sweden, bound and obliged to proceed in the same manner with the said lords the states general, in case the king of Sweden cannot be prevailed upon to accept willingly the said conditions; provided also, that, on the behalf of Sweden, the treaty of Elbing, and the elucidations mentioned in the seventh article of the said treaty at the Hague between the three states, (as well for the good and advantage of England as of the United Provinces, and the other included parties) be condescended unto, and fully accomplished.

And by the aforesaid offer the said lords the states general believe, that they have acquitted themselves sufficiently. And the said ambassador beseecheth the right honourable council of state, that such resolutions may be taken here, and such suitable orders given, that both states agreeing on the particulars here before-mentioned, may cordially and chearfully co-operate and concur together in establishing the said peace, and preserving their own mutual interests in those parts.

The $\frac{14}{24}$ th of July, 1659.

WIL. NIEUPOORT.

The answer of the council of state, appointed by the authority of parliament, to a paper exhibited by the lord ambassador of the lords the states general of the United Provinces, of the $\frac{14}{24}$ th July, 1659.

1. IN pursuance of what hath been already declared by the council concerning the form of the ratification of the treaty at the Hague of the $\frac{11}{21}$ th of May last being agreed upon, the said treaty is now ratified under the great seal of England, and shall forthwith be sent over to be delivered at the Hague to the public ministers of France and of the

A.D. 1659. United Provinces of the Netherlands respectively, upon their interchanging the like with England.

2. The council having taken into consideration the third and fourth articles of the said treaty, together with the proceedings, that the public ministers and commanders of the fleets of both commonwealths in the Sound (lately made known to them) do earnestly recommend it to the said lord ambassador, to represent to his superiors, that all care be taken for the due observation of the said articles on their part, as this state have given order to be done on the behalf of this commonwealth; so as not only during the first and second three weeks cessation, and such further prolongation thereof as is or shall be mutually consented unto, the assistance forbidden by the said third article be forborn, but also that there be a desisting, according to the fourth article, from the giving any kind of aid to the king of Denmark, so long as he continues (as hitherto he hath done) to refuse the just and equitable conditions of peace agreed to be tendered to him on the behalf of the three states, in pursuance of the said treaty.

3. The council do take notice, that the said lord ambassador, in his paper of the $\frac{1}{24}$ th of July, adds very little in substance to his paper of the $\frac{7}{17}$ th of July, unless it be in expostulating the case of the king of Denmark, and in favour of the treaty of Bromsbroo; which matters were all brought to the settlement by consent of the three states, declared in the said treaty at the Hague, and are not therefore to be anew disputed over again. Nor doth the reservatory clause mentioned in the said paper to be in the latter part of the second article, more redound to the advantage of Denmark than of Sweden, but mutually and equally respect them both; by reason whereof the council saw cause to express themselves as they did in the third particular of their former answer of the 28th of June last, unto which they do still adhere and refer themselves, with this further declaration, that the council are ready forthwith (if the said lord ambassador shall find himself authorized thereunto) to agree upon such particulars, (with the consent of the said three states, but especially of the said two commonwealths) whereby the mischiefs feared, some differences yet undecided may be avoided, and the terms of the peace between the two kings brought to a certainty upon the grounds of the Roschild treaty, and they necessitated to accept the same, not only by the real execution of the fourth article of the said treaty at the Hague, but also by the positive employing the force of both commonwealths in those parts against the refuser or refusers, in such manner as the ministers of the three states (at least those of England and the United Provinces) shall judge the most speedy, sure and effectual.

And by the said offer the council do believe they have sufficiently acquitted themselves, and do desire, that the particulars, whereby this affair may be brought to a certainty, upon the grounds above-mentioned, be speedily condescended unto, and agreed upon.

The bailiff of Dunkirk to Lockhart, governor of that town.

MY LORD,

AFTER my most humble respects, I shall tell you, that I have given myself the honour to write to your excellency the 18th of the last month, and given you advice of the arrival of the commissioners of England in this town, and what had passed till then. And now I shall tell you, that the said commissioners, and their assistants, busy themselves daily to inform themselves of the state and government of this town, as also of its magistracy, and what revenues they have, and wherein employ them; yet without speaking with the said magistracy to inform themselves of the truth, although I have given myself the honour to go to see them, and present my most humble servcie, as the deputies also of the said magistracy have done several times; to whom, as to me, they answered, that they thanked us for our civility, without saying any thing else to us, because, as we judge, they distrust us, and make more account of certain ill spirits, as of doctor Clerk, and others, who perswade them many things, as they please, though merely suggested, and that in hope of some reward; but at last they will find all is frivolous. Of which the magistrates being advertised, I went on their behalf to the assistants of the said commissioners, and offered them to confer of the said affairs, and the town revenues, and assured them, that those of the magistracy would give them clear information of all in writing, that they might after inform themselves thereof; and not finding their declaration true, they might hold them as dishonest persons. Whereupon they answered me without any thing else, that they would consider, having only demanded the state of the town revenues, and wherein employed; which was all strait delivered them in general terms, they yet having hitherto said nothing to us thereupon; but as we have it from good hands, they have said, this place must be governed after the English manner, and the revenues and directions thereof be taken from the magistracy, and the right of custom, grant and excise be changed; which has caused a great alteration among the magistracy and townsmen, because that would totally ruin most of them, being engaged for the said town, and having disbursed for it most of their commodities, and engaged their credit besides; that this would be a breach of the capitulation, which I cannot believe, nor imagine, that your excellency will suffer it to be done. And in this confidence I have assured the magistracy, and greatest

A.D. 1659. ^{the}greatest part of the townsmen, that your excellency will take so good care, and interpose your authority and credit with the parliament and council of state, that they will order this matter so, that there shall be no alteration therein, seeing there is no cause for it, and would be against the capitulation and faith given. This hath a little quieted their anxiety, confiding wholly in the goodness, prudence, and accustomed good discretion of your excellency, and that you will maintain us, and procure we may be maintained, in our antient privileges, and the disposal of the revenues of the town, as we have been hitherto. Wherefore, in the name of the people of this town, I cast myself at the feet of your excellency, beseeching you to have the goodness to continue us, and protect us, in the maintenance of our privileges and articles granted us upon capitulation, which you have had the goodness to do hitherto, and we shall be bound all the days of our lives to pray to the Almighty for the preservation and prosperity of your excellency, and all your family; beseeching you likewise to interpose your interest and credit with our lords of the parliament and council of state of England, that they would be so good as to maintain us in our antient privileges, and the direction of the town, and also to make the articles of capitulation be observed, as we doubt not, when they shall by your excellency be well informed of the truth of all things. Some of the magistracy, upon this alteration, propounded to send some of their deputies to our said lords of the parliament and council, to remonstrate to them the state of our affairs, and beseech them to continue us in our antient privileges and administrations, and to cause the articles of capitulation to be observed; which I prayed them to suspend, till advice given thereof to your excellency, to know if you approved it, we desiring to do nothing without the approbation and command of your excellency. Wherefore I most humbly beseech your excellency to be so good as send me for answer, what you desire we should do herein; and I will not fail to observe your orders, and cause them to be observed punctually; and if your excellency think fit, that some deputies be sent to the court, then to send me also the names of whom you desire should go. For myself, if your excellency think me capable, I would most willingly offer my service to be one; but, on the other side, I see, that I could difficultly absent myself from the town, while your excellency is away, yet shall rule myself in that, and all other things, by the order and good pleasure of your excellency, though I believe, and have so assured those of the magistracy, that your excellency will do an hundred thousand times more by your letters, than our deputies. Nevertheless we shall expect your excellency's orders, it deserving consideration also, that if any alteration be made in the government, privileges, and capitulation of the town, and that they will take from the magistracy the direction and administration, it will be the total ruin and destruction of this town, it being to be feared, that all the rich and considerable townsmen, finding themselves frustrated of their privileges, will be gone, and so the town become desert without traffick, and so be wholly ruined; which truly would be lamentable, though I will believe, that, by God's assistance, and the good management of your excellency, we shall not come to such extremity. The commissioners sent for me, and coming to them, desired of me a copy of our capitulation; which I gave them translated in English, they also demanding of me a list of all the inhabitants, Fleming, French, and Wallons, of this town; which I did as exactly as I could, and found them a thousand and sixty, which list I delivered them; and, at my going away again, offered them my service, and asked, if they had any thing more to command me. They answered, No. Since that, we have intreated the commissioners to give us leave to have the honour to entertain them at a treatment in the town-house; which they accepted, and is to be at noon, where we have invited the commanders of the town, Sir Brice Cockram, colonel, all the lieutenant-colonels in the town, major Hinton, and three or four principal officers more, to keep them company, hoping your excellency will approve thereof; only sorry we cannot have the felicity of your excellency's presence, which also would free us from all anxious thoughts, on occasion of the discourses held here, since the arrival of these gentlemen, concerning the change. But seeing that cannot be, and that your excellency is in probability to do us a greater benefit, and give us the general peace, which we beseech the Almighty to give us, unto the contentment of your excellency and our superiors, whereof we hope shortly to understand the success, I shall pray God for the preservation of your excellency, as making profession to be, and to continue all my life long,

MY LORD,

Your excellency's very humble, very obedient,

Dunkirk, 28. July, 1659. [N. S.]

and very obliged humble servant,

PETER FAULCONNIER.

The first paper from the king of Denmark, brought to the commissioners by Peter Rytz, Aug. 1. 1659.

L'ON croit, que pour avancer tant plus promptement la negotiation & l'achevement de la paix entre les deux couronnes Septentrionales, il soit necessaire, de declarer aux mediateurs le fondement & la vraye base des justes pretensions de la couronne de Denmark & Norvege; à sçavoir, qu'elle demande premierement restitution des provinces, tant de celles que le roy de Suede apres la rupture de la paix de Roeschilde possede à cette heure, que de celles, dont il a esté chassé, & il est tenu par le dit traité de rendre. Secondement, satisfaction des despences & dommages inestimables causez aux estats de la dite couronne par l'irruption, que le roy de Swede y a faite. Et comme il n'y a rien de plus conforme à la justice que cela, & que c'est l'essence mesme de traité de Roeschilde, sur le pied du quel les tres estats ont fondées la negotiation de la paix du Nort, la dite couronne se promet tant de l'equité & le candeur des messieurs les mediateurs, qu'en cela ils appuieront vigoreusement la justice de sa cause; quant au changement, qu'on juge se devoir faire aux points du traité de Roeschilde, du quel aussi messieurs les mediateurs desirent, qu'on leur donne part, un project s'en fera au plutost, estant une affaire, qui requiert quelques jours de temps.

Extrait du register des resolutions, &c. le premier d'Aoust, 1659, [N. S.]

ESTANT mis en deliberation, il a esté trouvé bon & entendu, que pour prevenir toutes fortes de difficultés, qui pourroient naistre au sujet de l'isle de Ween, de declarer comme L. H. P. declarent par celle ci, qu'en cas que dans les quinze jours mentionnés dans la derniere convention du 24. du mois passé, relatif un traité de la Haye du 21. May de cette année, que la dite isle de Ween ne soit de franche volonté cedée par le roy de Suede au roy de Denmark, que la volonté & intention de L. H. P. est à ce sujet, selon la convention, comme elle est encore, que la dite isle demeure en propre à sa dite majesté de Suede; & de la dite resolution & declaration de L. H. P. sera envoyé extrait authentique aux seigneurs deputés, executeurs de cet estat pres les dits hauts & puissants roys, pour le mettre en execution, & pour se regler à l'advenant. Il sera aussi mis es mains de Monsieur l'ambassadeur de Thou, & du commissaire Downing, un extrait de la dite resolution, pour leur servir respectivement, où il sera de besoin, comme aussi aux seigneurs ambassadeurs Boreel & Nieuport, pour se regler à l'advenant; & ainsi estoit signés.

An intercepted letter.

SIR,

July 22. 1659.

I DOE much wonder, you have not vouchsafed me the favour of a letter these two last posts under this cover, because I humbly desire you would speak to Mr. Smyth, or captain Barker, (under whose cover it comes to him) that I might continue it, notwithstanding their remove, which were easie for the captain to doe by his wife, who lives in the same house with the resident; and I presume, unless that course bee taken, this will be last I can so send, expecting their speedy departure. By it I writt the first and eighth instant; the fifteenth I forboor, a general search of all paquets being then intended, and what

A.D. 1659. what perverse construction they might make of an inocent paper, I knew not. Our present affayres are very odd, the grandees and commonwealthsmen striving for superiority, Quakers and Anapabtists every-where arming; the Presbyterians, or a great part of them united with the cavileers; dayly alarums of Ch. St. landing, and universal confusion throughout the nation. Sir Hen. Vane and major Salway are deserted by many of their party, not having more than sixteen or seventeen, that can give concurrent votes. It is sayd, they desire the adjournment of the house, that the whole manage of affairs might pass by the council, where they believe themselves more prevalent. Sir Ar. Hasl. did this morning very smartly oppose it, desiring rather a summons of all, that are absent, and a settlement of the nation. In Hartfordshire and many other places the commissioners refuse to sett the tax, till the parliament have declared the government, resolving to have a free comonwealth; but after what model, no two places, nay scarce two persons, agree. An anuall parliament, and a councill in the intervals, is in most vogue. Whether the members of one shall bee eligible againe till the third or fifth year, is controverted, the grandees hoping to carry a voluntary election without such limitation, and by that means perpetuate their own interests in the government. Coll. Lambert (for that is now his most frequent appellation in the house) is so little in their good graces, that were hee to pass his regiments at this tyme, hee would not have ten votes. They find him aspire, and will shortly prevent that danger, unless it please God to bring a worse upon them by insurrections. Then indeed they will have occasion to use his courage and conduct, whereby he will undoubtedly merit the generalship, if victorious; outing Fleetewood, and attempting sovereignty. There is a list pretended by him of three hundred names, mutually ingaged to rise in armes; which indeed I cannot believe, since wee have always found it a usefull pollicy at all times, to give out confidently the discovery of all counsels from abroad, and conspiracies at home, to fright rash undertakers from enterprizing any thing. And truly, supposing there were any such horrible intention, it were easye to make a list of three times three hundred noblemen and gentlemen, who would in all probability abett it: but alas! what can they do without common hands? this having been our great advantage, that the maine quarrel being against the gentry of the nation, between whom and the ordinary sort of people there is a natural animositye of late years infinitely increased, they have no power to debauch our soldiers, nor doe they condescend to those arts, by which they might be captivated. Hence comes it, that, since 1648, no mutiny hath been caused by them, no partye have been inveighed, much less a general defection (frequent in story). But these, as I told you, are a different race of men; nor can any precepts of policy, examples antient or modern, instruct any man to guess, what they will or will not doe. The militia not yet established in the countyes, two justices of peace next adjoining are every-where authorized to sieze suspected persons, horses, armes, &c. by which authority, with the assistance of the country troop, or those of the army neer them, severall places in Surry, Essex, Bedfordshire, Worcestershire, &c. have been searched, and some gentlemen taken; but noe evill intentions being discovered, it is to be hoped wee shall enjoy a peaceable harvest. How farr Mr. Newport's papers may increase the jealousye, I cannot say, reports being various: but if it please God to send the sword once more amongst us, the scabbords of all, that rise, will be thrown away, no mercy being to be hoped after it. Our army is very little increased; nor can wee have any firm relyance on the city, who will bee freinds to the conquerors, foes to the conquered, which party soever prevayle. And truly from them ariseth our greatest fear; for should wee leave them to themselves, they themselves know not what they would doe, when free from the curb of the army: keeping that bridle, who should repress the enemy? This dilemma perplexes the wisest heads of the nation; nor doe I find a cheerefull man of all my generall acquaintance in the house and army, which makes us superstitiously to feare some more then ordinary turne of fate, though my owne share bee the least of ten thousand, and my interests so ballanced, that unless a conquest be made by Quakers, which can never last a month in settlement, or by Ch. St. which is improbable, I shall have the same quiet aboad amongst my books, and frank entertaynement by some of the formost men in power, that I now enjoy; and blest God for this singular felicity hee hath in these times of tryall afforded

Your most humble and faythfull servant.

Sir

Sir Ph. Meadowe to the council of state.

RIGHT HONORABLE,

A.D. 1659.

Vol. lxx.
p. 255.

MY last to your honors was from Fredericksberg, of the 19th instant, sent by the post the day after the commissioners plenipotentiarie arrived heer in the Sound; upon advise whereof I immediately removed hither. They have not yet had audience, because his majestie of Sweden, being gone for Naskow in Laland before their arrival, returned but yesterday to Fridericksburg, whither the commissioners wil either goe to meet him, or els the king come hither; and I suppose the first audience wil be to-morrow.

I, not being in the same commission with the plenipotentiaries, shal, for the future, have nothing of importance to communicate to your honors; because whatever occurs in the transaction of this weighty busines, you wil have advertisement thereof from better hands. I crave leave therefore to make a humble address to your honors on my own behalf, which I am the more emboldned to doe, as having served the publike both at home and abroad these many years, and that with many hazards and suffrances, wherein my services have never had respect to the particular interests of any person, party, or faction, but have been immediately directed to the publike concernments of the commonwealth, whome I shal be stil ready to serve with my life and fortune to the utmost of my abilitie. That, which with all humble submission I beg of your honors, is the libertie to return for England; which I am induced to ask upon sundry considerations: not long since a small estate in lands besel me in England by the death of an uncle, upon which I have not yet made entry; besides that I am obliged by his will to grant over certain conveniences of annuities, which I am not in capacity to doe, by reason of my absence, and yet in the mean time am obnoxious in law to great penalties upon non-performance.

When I was in Portugal some years since upon publike employment, I received there a dangerous wound. The rigour of this clime in the winter-season renews the grief of it, and endangers the loss of one of my hands.

His majestie of Sweden, as he himself lately informed me, and as I advised in my last, intends to pass this winter in Sweden, being urgently recalled thither by his own affairs. It will scarce be possible, and perhaps impertinent or unuseful, for a publike minister to follow him thither. Upon these and other inducements, too long to rehearse, I in al dutiful humilitie refer myself to your honors favor, entreating, that letters revocatory may, at my instant supplication, be sent to the king, with whom I reside, to dispense with my discontinuance from this service, at least for the ensueing winter; and that I may have orders to embarque myself for England by the first opportunity of shipping, which presents from the fleet.

I have already freely and fully communicated with the plenipotentiaries the state of things, as they have passed heer, and as they are at present. And if in any thing I can be useful to the advancement of the publike service, I shall most willingly contribute my utmost thereto. I have already declared as much to them, who, I am confident, will not deny me their testimonies of my readines and integritie.

I hope, before this arrives, order will be given to Mr. Noel to accept of my bill of the 19th instant for 250 l. sterling, which I mentioned in my last. If the bil be protested, it wil be to my disreputation. Mr. Noel has been very backward of late; and yet never publike minister managed his expences with greater frugalitie then I have done. I remain

Your HONORS

Elfinore, July 28th, 1659.

Most humble and ever faithful servant,

PH. MEADOWE.

The English plenipotentiaries in the Sound to the president of the council.

My LORD,

Vol. lxx.
p. 259.

BEING arrived here the 21st of this month, we should, before this time, have given your lordship an account of ourselves, and so much as we could know of our business; but being promised every day, that the king of Sweden would be here either the same or the next, and that we might have audience the first hour after his coming, we did stay the dispatch of the ketch, until that were passed, that we might be more full in our relation. But we are yet kept in uncertainty; and though we sent a gentleman yesterday to Fredericksburgh with a copy of our credentials, to be shewed to the secretary of state, with our desire for a speedy audience, he is not yet returned. The most that we can at present say,

say, is, that having been on board your fleet, we find it in a good condition of strength; A.D. 1659.
 but sickness doth grow amongst them, and the victual doth grow short, which we do endeavour to supply by providing the particulars mentioned in the inclosed note, which amounting unto about fifteen hundred pounds, over and above what is already provided, or ordered to be paid, we desire your lordship to cause to be paid accordingly. We have received from Mr. Downing a copy of an agreement made at the Hague the $\frac{14}{24}$ th instant; and though it is not authentically signed, we do proceed upon it with the Holland ministers, without any dispute, finding it suitable unto our instructions; so that even without it we might have concluded with them the matter of it. There was some discourse between them and us of the quindecim dies continuos, and when they should begin; which is now agreed on all sides, that it shall be quindecim dies post tractatum initum; and that in the mean time we should apply ourselves to both the kings, to persuade them unto a cessation of arms for that time; and if that be refused, the Hollanders do engage themselves to compel the king of Denmark. And we have promised, that if the refuse be on the king of Sweden's side, we will give them full liberty to proceed against him, as they shall think fit, until he doth give his assent; which they like very well, knowing what power they have over him, in case we desist from assisting him. On the 24th of this month we had information, that Opdam and de Ruyter had left their station near Copenhagen, taken on board the 4000 men formerly brought out of Holland, joined themselves with Bielk the Danish admiral, gathered together about 100 barks and boats of several sorts, fit for the transportation of horse and foot, and set sail (as we thought) for Jutland or Holstein, to transport the Brandenburgers. Upon conference with the two Holland ministers (that are here) upon the same day, and discoursing of the last agreement at the Hague, Mr. Slingerland did propose a cessation for the 15 days of the treaty. We, by way of question, proposed, whether not only that was necessary, but that we, who were employed by the two commonwealths, ought not to take care to prevent any mischief, that might fall out between the two fleets, before such time as we could obtain the kings consent to the cessation, especially the Holland fleet having set sail so provided, that it was probable they went upon some great expedition? And whether it were not adviseable, that we should stop all such proceedings, by undertaking either of us for the fleet of our own nation, (they shewing, that they had sufficient power to engage their own) that they should not attempt any act of hostility during the time we were for preparing for the treaty? They offered to undertake for de Ruyter and his fleet, only leaving Opdam free; which we not accepting, parted without any conclusion, and thought it most for the commonwealth's service to prepare our fleet to follow the Dutch and Danes, and observe their motions. The next day we had a message from the two Dutch ministers here, that they had received notice from their colleagues at Copenhagen, that upon the receipt of the agreement at the Hague, they had stopped Opdam and de Ruyter's motions for the present; and that, if we would have a conference with all the ministers of their state, to conclude that business, they would go with us to a place half-way betwixt this and Copenhagen, and send to their colleagues to meet us there; unto which we readily assented. And to avoid the dispute for place, which might happen with the French ambassador, who was thought necessary to be there, we desired to entertain them in a frigate, that was brought to lie near that place; which they taking very well, we all met there; and agreeing unanimously to prevent all action, that might disturb the treaty, and undertaking each for the fleet belonging to their own commonwealth, and that they should attempt nothing against one another, or either of the two kings, whilst we were preparing for the treaty, the Dutch did immediately dispatch orders to their commanders to give them notice of it, and accordingly to cease from all acts of hostility. The Dutch ministers have very fully assured us, that if the king of Denmark will not assent to the cessation or the peace to be concluded, they will use their power to force him, according to the contents of the late agreement. And though our instructions are large enough to shew us in what manner we should proceed with the king of Sweden, in case he should refuse, as also in relation to the said agreement; yet we desire your lordship, that if this new state of things has given you any other thoughts than such as are expressed in our instructions, your lordship will be pleased to let us know them, that they may be a further guide unto us, and we may in all things conform ourselves unto them. We have also a further scruple, upon which we desire to know your lordship's pleasure, which is, in what manner we should proceed, in case neither of the kings will assent unto the peace; for we think, that probably will be the case, the king of Denmark not only insisting upon a general peace, and refusing any with the exclusion of the Brandenburgers and Imperialists, but, according to the best information we can have from Sir Philip Meadowe and others, we have reason to doubt the king of Sweden will be very unwilling to assent unto a peace, according to the said agreement at the Hague, unless his peace may be also made with the emperor, whose power he is not able to withstand, unless England and France join in assisting him; and Pomerania being so wasted, that there be no subsistence for his army there,

A.D. 1659 there, he will be extremely streightened how to provide quarters for his army this winter; and sums up his desires in these few words, either that we should make a general peace, that he may disband his army, or suffer him to stay here, where he may maintain it; by which your lordship may see, how different the inclinations of that king are from what is ordinarily represented in England. We think, the relation of his force at land and sea is not more truly represented. Those troops of his, that we have seen, are extremely weak, ill armed, ill mounted, few in number, and in all respects in an ill condition; and we are informed, his others are not better; but yet the strength in Copenhagen consisting of the most part of burghers (who are only to defend walls) they well enough keep them in. His sea-force is not more considerable, and the state of it is so well known unto the Dutch, that they do not apprehend the English should receive any considerable assistance from them, which, we believe, doth increase their confidence. And we do humbly offer it unto your lordship, whether it would not be a great help to us in our treaty, and much advance the desired peace, if you would be pleased to send vice-admiral Lawson, with an addition of six or eight good ships, which we leave unto your lordship's consideration. We think ourselves obliged to represent unto your lordship, that Sir Philip Meadows is not willing to continue here this winter, the condition of his health not at all agreeing with this climate in that season, especially being incommodated with a shot in his hand, which he received in Portugal, his own affairs also requiring his return into England after his long absence; upon which considerations only he doth desire your lordship to discharge him by that time, and in the mean he doth offer to serve the commonwealth to the utmost of his power, or to obey your lordship's command, if you find it for your service, after his return, to employ him in any other place. The gentleman we sent to Fredericksburg is now returned with his answer from the king, that lodgings are provided for us there, and that if we will come thither to-morrow, we shall have audience immediately on the next day, at our choice. We incline to the most speedy, and have therefore agreed with his majesty's officers here, that it shall be to-morrow in the afternoon. The manner of our reception will be, that two senators will meet us half a mile from the place, and bring us first to our own lodgings, and from thence to the king; which, before the making up of our paquet, we thought necessary to be signified unto your lordship by,

My LORD,

Your lordship's most humble and faithful servants.

Towards the supply of this, there hath been already 1000 l. charged by general Montagu upon the treasurer of the navy in England, and bills received here by appointment of the council of state for 4000 l. sterling; so that the overplus will be to be provided, as also 1000 l. more for the defraying divers other occasions, and providing necessaries for the many sick men, which are daily kept on shore.

Col. Lillingston and col. Allsopp to the lord Warriston, president of the council of state.

RIGHT HONORABLE,

Dunkirk, 29. July, 1659.

WE this morning received your honour's letter, dated the 22d July, containing an order to discharge all ships belonging to the United Provinces brought into this road or harbour by any subjects of our commonwealth, or inhabitants of this place, upon pretence of commissions from foreign princes, and to cause them, with their loading, to be restored; as also not to suffer any prizes to be brought in by foreigners, but to cause them immediately to depart, without breaking bulk; the which orders we shall to the utmost punctually observe: and in obedience thereunto, upon request of Mr. Payne, servant of the Dutch ambassador, made inquiry forthwith touching two vessels in the road of Mardike, by him claimed, as belonging to the subjects of the said United Provinces, with their loadings, viz. the Black Raven laden with salt, Jacob Jansen master, of Amsterdam, and the Hope of Home, master Cornelis Arensen, laden with fish; which latter (as we understand) was already restored by the taker before the coming of your order; and the former hath been brought up hither above these three months, and upon the condemnation here inclosed (being of the Swedish ambassador at London) the lading was sold by one Spalding, a Swede, who sojourns here; and the customs received here, being above 2000 l. and the king of Sweden's duties, have (it seems) eaten up the proceed of the salt, which we could not then so effectually prevent, partly because we had not instructions from your honour, and partly in regard of our extreme necessities, the soldiers being in a mutinous temper for want of money; besides, that one Mr. Van Houten, a merchant of this town, by virtue of a procuration, maketh claim to her and her lading, or some part of them, as belonging to the French. But however, what the said Mr. Payne shall make appear to belong to the subjects of the Netherlands, and hath been taken by any English, shall be restored, where-ever we can find it; and we have charged the said Swedish gentleman not to set forth any men of war from hence, nor to employ any inhabitants more of this place in them, and shall to our utmost seek to prevent any attempts of others in that kind. As to the concernments of this place, we are, God be praised, in a quiet and peaceable condition. Our works go on very well; only we are in a very great streight for money for our weekly subsistence, and have this week been put to hard shifts, having engaged our own credit to the burgomasters, and have been forced to draw 500 l. on the late commissioners, having been forced to pay 1300 l. to the workmen, for the going on in the fortification since the commissioners departure. We are in hand with all we intend shall be done this year, as also so much of the same hills as we intend to have levelled this summer, which we shall endeavour to cover with dung. We have also bought 5000 palisadoes, and must buy more; and we must buy 100,000 bundles of reed, for a hedge round the works to keep off the sand: yet nothing is or shall be done, but what is of necessity for the perpetuating of this place to our nation. We humbly desire your honour to represent our want of moneys to the council, as also to move them for supplies thereof, and of coals and candles for the winter provision, with all speed, and those other necessities,

A.D. 1659. faries, whereof we have given the particulars to the commissioners; as also for one month's provision more than what we have, to lie in store. All our works will, we hope, be finished within these three weeks, as also the sand-hills. We again humbly desire your instructions touching one Walker, a woman, and a 'prentice, in custody here about false money, whether your honour will have them tried here, or to be sent to England. We also desire your honour to inform us of whatever you shall think or know of conducing to the preservation of this place, and which you judge us fit to be informed of; as also of all other matters, wherein we may testify our zeal and readines to be and remain,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Your honour's most humble servants,

HEN. LILLINGSTON.
ROG. ALLSOPP.

Instructions for col. John Fagg.

At the council of state at Whitehall, 31st July, 1659.

Vol. Ixv.
P. 363.

YOU are forthwith to repair into Suffex, to preserve the peace of that county, and do your endeavour to suppress and subdue any of the enemies of the commonwealth, that shall be, or preparing to rise, in arms here, and to have an especial regard to the security of Chichester and Arundel.

You are to give orders to captain Souton in the militia company, or any other officers of the army or militia, that shall be in readines, to march into Arundel castle, and remove those, that are at present inhabitant there. You are to give order to the county troop, that are at Arundel, to march to Chichester, or some other part of the county, as there be occasion.

You are to endeavour to get the commanders of the militia in Suffex to meet, and put in execution the powers therein given them for the raising of the militia; and in the mean time you are to raise in arms such well-affected persons, as shall be willing to list themselves under you, in any part of Suffex, either for horse or foot, as the service requires; and employ and command them for the safety of the county.

You are further to do whatsoever you can to your utmost ability, and whatsoever may conduce to the preserving the public peace, and suppressing the enemies thereof in Suffex, or the parts adjacent.

All the horse and foot of the army and militia, that are now, or that you shall raise in the said county, are to observe your orders and directions for the service.

You are to let those of the militia force, that shall voluntarily engage in this service, know, that they shall receive pay equal with the army for the time they are in actual service.

You are to hold correspondence with the forces of the army and militia, that are in Kent, and Surrey, and Hampshire, and Wilts, as there shall be occasion; and send to the council frequently an account of your proceedings.

Signed, &c.

The report of col. Ashfield, col. Packer, and lieutenant-colonel Pearson, concerning the affairs of Dunkirk.

May it please your HONOURS,

Vol. Ixv.
P. 339.

IN obedience to your commands, we repaired to the town of Dunkirk, and, with the assistance of colonel Lillingston and colonel Allsopp, endeavoured to inform ourselves of all things given us in your honours instructions; and, as the return of our obedience therein, we humbly offer this as our report:

That having taken the best information we could of the state of that town and garison, we humbly refer our report of the garison to some following heads. And for the inhabitants, we find them wholly to be natives and Papists, except some few English of late come. The number of housekeepers, with the religious, amounts to about 1060, besides servants, women, children, each of which, in time of siege, are usually supplied out of the merchants stores, which will usually maintain the inhabitants with provisions for four months, or upwards. We find convenient magazines and storehouses in the garison, with a considerable quantity of ammunition, and other utensils of war, an account of which we have brought with us, together with the accounts of what is wanting for A.D. 1659. defences of the garison, which we do herewith humbly present.

Having viewed the fortifications, we find, that besides the ancient wall of the town, and a graft to it of 100 foot or more in breadth, there is a line carried round the town at some distance, which consists of a very substantial earthwork palisadoed, made as regular (and according to art) as the ground would admit. To some part of the said work there is a fosse-bay, and each bastion and curtain is defended with demy-lunes, and two grafts, each 60 foot in breadth, or thereabouts; and for the most part 8, 9, or 10 foot deep of water, and without this a very good counterscarp strongly palisadoed, together with half-moons, spurs, and ravelins without, in such places as are most approachable by an enemy.

That fort Oliver, situate upon the river Culme, one mile and $\frac{1}{2}$ from Dunkirk, is a very good earth-work regular, consisting of four bastions double palisadoed, two large grafts, and betwixt them a fossebay pallisadoed; without all a good counterscarp; and for easy relief of this fort there is a small square fort built in the midway betwixt fort Oliver and Dunkirk.

And in regard of the distance of fort Oliver from the town of Dunkirk, we think it necessary, that lodgings should with all speed be built in the said fort for 5 or 600 men, and store-houses for their provisions; all which is wanting at present, the said fort being now kept by two companies, which are relieved every week.

For defence of the town of Dunkirk in this present posture of affairs we conceive, that there cannot be less than 3000 foot, and the present regiment of horse; the fortifications being of that extent, that they will require 1000 men a night to be upon the guards. The main guard must also be strong, considering the condition of the inhabitants.

For defence of fort Oliver, 300 men, and 50 men for the square fort, called Fort Manning. The town and forts in time of siege will require double the foresaid number, which will amount near to 7000 foot, and 1000 horse, which number, by God's blessing, and careful conduct, may be able to check the best armies of France and Flanders.

We have also viewed and considered the fort of Mardike, and conceive, that it will not be able to hold out many days against an army, when besieged:

1. Because an enemy, upon the first approach, may lodge themselves in sand-banks within carbine shot of the fort.

2. It cannot contain any number of men considerable for a sally.

3. When an enemy gets once under a bastion to chamber it, and spring the mine, there is not room for retrenchment.

4. And further, it is much out of repair. Therefore it is humbly offered as our advice, and the advice of the officers of Dunkirk, that the fort of Mardike should be demolished with all speed.

5. During the time of our abode at Dunkirk we used all diligence to find out the occasion of the late mutiny, and the only reason alleged to us was want of pay, and some pretences of their not being in the same capacity as to pay with the soldiery of England.

6. Some other reasons were alleged, but we cannot find any thing upon the account of Charles Stuart, neither do we find any person affected to him in employment within the garison.

7. In obedience to your commands, in the 7th head of our instructions, we called the officers and soldiers together, and declared to them the care, that the parliament had and would have of that garison, to provide pay and all other things necessary for security and defence thereof; and promised to make their desires and wants known to the council, which gave them good satisfaction, and much settled their minds; and as a testimony of their affections to their old masters, both officers and soldiers unanimously signed an address*, lately presented to the parliament.

8. We have taken an account of all officers and soldiers within the garison; and for the number of officers and soldiers, or what officers are unnecessary, we humbly refer to some papers, which we have to present.

9. We have taken inspection into the accounts of the garison, as to what money hath been sent by the parliament and council, what formerly, and what hath been received by customs, excise, contributions, and other public revenues, and what is in arrear; which we refer to an account to be delivered by us, and will be more particularly avouched by Mr. Brown, who hath been intrusted by colonel Lockhart with the accounts of the garison, and will be here in a few days.

10. We have had some inspection into the business of customs, and excise, and other public revenues; and, several things about it being intricate, we desire some few days respite before we give in an account thereof.

11. Having considered what may be necessary for the defence and good government of Dunkirk, we humbly propose:

* This address was presented 27. July. Whitelocke, p. 681.

A.D. 1659.

1. That an honest, godly, faithful, and able person, may be resident in the town as governor.
2. That provision may be made for godly, painful, and learned preachers of the gospel.
3. That care may be taken in the choice of such magistrates, as are annually to be chosen by the commonwealth of England, as it is lord of Dunkirk, which is a considerable part of the magistracy. Some there are in office for life, as will more plainly appear, when we come to give in the account of the revenue.
4. That care may be taken for the arrears of that garison, and constant supply of money for the future.
5. In regard, that provision of all sorts is much dearer in Dunkirk than in any part of England, we humbly propose, that the officers and soldiers in Dunkirk may be upon the same establishment for pay with the forces in England.
6. A constant supply of money for repairs of the works, and other contingencies, is altogether needful, in regard the works are sandy, and thereby more apt to fall.
7. We humbly offer, that an establishment may be made for the garison, and commissions sent with all speed to all officers, that shall be thought fit to be continued.
8. Memorandum, That there are in the town of Dunkirk certain buildings for officers and soldiers, lying together on the south side of the town, called the barracks, or Spanish quarters, which will conveniently lodge about 1500 men, to whom there must be an allowance of fire, and candle, and bedding; the particulars whereof shall be given in another paper.

In obedience to those commands, we received from the council in their additional instructions.

Vol. lxxv.
p. 343.

1. WE have taken an account of all the officers in the garison of Dunkirk, (according to the best intelligence we could get) how they stand affected to the present government, and what they are in life and conversation, which we shall be ready to give an account of, when the council shall please to call for it.
2. The persons sent to assist us in settling the excise, customs, and other public revenues, being unfree to stay at Dunkirk, or to take upon them the management of the said revenue, we were necessitated to leave the management thereof in the hands of Mr. Delavall, who hath formerly done it. A more full account thereof shall be given to your honour, with the account of the revenue, by

Your most humble,

and most obedient servants.

An account of public revenues of Dunkirk.

Vol. lxxv.
p. 344.

WE E humbly certifie, that the revennews of this town, so far as wee can by intelligence informe ourselves, are such as doe belong unto,

1. The state of England.
2. The governor of the town.
3. The town and corporation itselſe.
4. The town-major.

The revennews belonging unto the state of England are customes, part excise, contribution money, pountguelt, which is weigh money, and measure money, houses and lands, and prisson money.

Of customes.

The revennews of customes due to the state arriseth upon goods imported and exported, seizures, and confiscations.

There are fower sorts of duties received for all goods imported and exported, two whereof doe belong to the state, one to the town, and one to the governor.

1. The first belonging to the state is the duty of custom, which is about $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. according to the vallue mentioned in a written book of rates, a copy whereof is annexed hereunto in French and English.

Memorand. That townsmen and forreigners pay custom alike for all things, excepting the stranger paieth for wine 3 guilders per tonn more than the townsmen doe.

2. The second belonging to the state is lastage or tonnage, which by estimation is about halfe one per cent. payable according to the package of the said goods.

3. The third is called Octroy, which is about one per cent. of the vallue of goods A.D. 1659. aforefaid, except wine, brandy, falt, and corn, which paieth a small matter more, which duty belongeth unto the town. A more particular accompt whereof is rendered under the head of town duties.

4. The fowerth dutie is called governor's, which is a small duty paiaable for all goods going out of this town by land carriage, or per water, into the country, which is likewise mentioned under the head of governor's duties.

Of seizures.

The revennews of seizures and confiscations are uncertain, being contingent. The laws and customs of this place touching seizures are strict and severe, according to many statutes made concerning the same. Some cases of seizures are as followeth:

1. Touching goods imported.

Upon the arrivall of any vessell into the jurisdiction of this port, the master of the said vessell is immeadiatly to make report at the custom-house from whence he came, and with what lading, and to signe his said report, which is entred in the collector's book; after which the severall merchants doe make their respective declarations, every one at one time reporting his whole adventure in the said shipp both for quantity and quality; after which declaration the collector giveth him a licence to land his goods, which licence the merchant is to deliver to the officer or waiter appointed to deliver the said shipp; which goods are brought unto a publick warehouse for examination: if more be found in the vessell then was first entred per the said master, the officer immeaditely maketh seizure of the said goods and shipp, which are ordinarily condemned by the judges of a court called the chamber of license, according to severall laws made to that purpose, whereby sometimes the master is fined in a penaltie at the discretion of the said judges, sometimes the shipp is confiscated, the said goods over-entred, condemned, and the proprietors thereof (if discovered) are fined at fower times the vallue of the said goods.

If the master or shipper shall deliver any goods to a merchant, before the said merchant shall bring a license from the custome-house for the delivery thereof, notwithstanding the said master hath made entry of the said goods at his first report, he shall be sentenced, and fined, at the discretion of the aforefaid judges, and the said goods so delivered are likewise confiscated.

If the master entereth more goods than are found upon delivery, the master paieth the duty of the goods so entred, as if they had been there.

2. Touching goods exported.

The merchant exporting any goods out of the harbour, either by seas, or by rivers, into the countries, must first goe to the custome-house, and make declaration of the time, quantity and quality of the said goods, and take out a cockquet or license for the report thereof; and in case any goods be found in the shipp by an officer, before any such declaration hath been made, and licence obtained, the said ship and goods are seizable, and ordinarily condemned by the aforementioned judges, and fower times the vallue of the said goods.

If so be any merchant shall make a short entry of any goods outward-bound, upon the discovery thereof, by the officer, he is to be fined above the double vallue of all the goods that he hath in the said vessell, as well that which is entred, as that which is not, and the shipper also fined at the discretion of the said judges.

Noe post entries are admitted of any goods inwards or outwards.

Memorand. The aforefaid court of licence doth consist of three judges, one secretary, one advocate-fiscall, and one serjeant, who are paid a certain salary out of the revennew of customs, who are subject to sitt, as need shall require, at the request and desires of the officers to that purpose.

Memorand. That the benefitt of seizures is divided into 3 parts, one-third to the state, one-third amongst the officers, and one-third to the discoverer of the same, being officers, or others.

Of excize.

Goods excizable, by the custom of this place, are only beer, wine, and brandy.

Excize.

Strong beer paieth $4\frac{1}{2}$ gilders, or 7 s. sterling per Flemish tonn, containing about 4 or 5 Beere. gallons more than an English barrell.

Small beer paieth 15 souce, being about 14 d. sterling per barrell.

Wine of all sorts paieth $27\frac{1}{2}$ gilders per hoghead, being about 41 s. 4 d. sterling.

Wine.

Brandy paieth excise 15 souce, or 14 d. sterling per stoup, conteining about five English Brandy. pynts.

Memorand. That the town hath allwaies claimed the benefitt of the whole excize as belonging unto themselves, per grant from the Spanish states, under which they have been for

A.D. 1659. for the severall services of the town, excepting souce, or 18 d. sterling upon every barrell of strong beer, and 5 souce upon every barrill of small beer, which belong to the state, as also excepting 3 souce upon every stoup or pottle of brandy sent out of the town, which doe belong likewise unto the state.

Memorand. That the aforesaid 20 souce, and 5 souce upon strong and small beer, is farmed by the lord Lockhart to the brewers of this town for 6000 guilders for 2 years from the 3^o October, 1658. to the 3^o October, 1660.

Memorand. That the town hath agreed with the lord Lockhart, upon consideration of the aforesaid 3 souce upon every stoup of brandy sent out of the town as aforesaid to be received by them, as also for the procurement of his countenance and favour, that $\frac{1}{3}$ part of the revennews of the whole excise shall be paid for the use of the commonwealth of England, which is, according to their former agreement, made with the French, when the town was under their jurisdiction, and which was not allowed to the Spanyards whilest under their jurisdiction.

Memorand. That for the first 3 moneths after this town was surrendered, the lord Lockart did receive for the use of the state out of the revennews of the excize aforesaid the sum of 1200 guilders, which is 4800 guilders, or 369 l. 4 s. 9 d. sterling per ann. and for the 9 moneths ending the last of June last, he did receive the summ of 21154 guilders for the state, which is after the rate of 26442 gild. 10 souce, being about 2034 l. 0 s. 10 d. sterling per ann. so that by this agreement there doth accrew unto the state more then was paid to the 4 states of Flanders, 21642 guilders, or about 1664 l. 15 s. 9 d. sterling per ann.

Of contribution-money.

Contribution-money is money paid by the country adjacent, distinguished into severall lymittations and precincts called per the name of Castelines, and is by agreement made by the lord Lockhart, and the said Castelines, upon consideration of protection from plunder, and free quarter of the English foldiers with Castelines are six in number, viz.

	Gilders.
The castelny of Bergh paieth per ann.	10000
The castelny of Bourbourgh	03000
The castelny of Cassell	25000
The castelny of Furns	13000
The town of Bell	05500
The town of Poppering	01800
	58300

Which said 58300 guilders is about 4484 l. 12 s. sterling money.

Memorand. That the said contribution-money is paialbe at three payments in equall proportion by the yeare for the use of this garrison.

Of pountgelt, weigh-money, and measure-money.

Pountgelt is a certain small revennew coming in upon goods weighable and measurable, which is received (as we conceive) by the keeper of the prisson, the benefitt whereof, together with some other small and petty revennews are disposed towards the payment of the charges of criminall prissoners, executioner, &c.

Of houses and lands.

There doeth belong unto the state of England two houses scituate in this town, which formerly did belong to the king of Spaine, in one whereof capt. Johnson, commissary, now liveth, and the other is imployed for a store-house for ammunition, being allwaies so employed by the Spanish and French governors.

What houses, lands, and personall estates, within the jurisdiction of this town, doe belong unto the subjects of Spain, and are sequestrable, being not included in the articles of capitulation, upon the surrender of the town, wee cannot as yet understand, (though wee hear there are some things considerable of this nature) but doe humbly leave the same to be inquired into by such as shall be authorized for that purpose.

Of prisson-money.

Lastly, The prisson of this town belongeth to the commonwealth, the revennews whereof are disposed likewise to maintein the said prisson, and the prisoners therein.

Memorand. The whole revennews of the state, since the taking of the town, being from the 27^o June, 1658, unto the first of July, 1659, (by which) the whole publick revenues may be estimated communibus annis, were as followeth, viz.

For

	l.	s.	d.	A.D. 1659.
For customs inwards	747	00	8 11	}
For customs outwards	037	98	18 00
For attach, lastage, or tonnage, inwards	054	85	12 09
For the same outwards	003	23	15 00
For seizures	010	28	18 04
For contribution money	583	00	00 00
For excise	253	54	00 00
	168	99	13 00

Which 168991 guilders, 13 souce, is about 12999 l. 7 s. 4 d. sterling.

Besides the small and petty revenues not brought into the publick treasury, but expended about the administration of justice as aforesaid.

Of the governor's duties.

There belongeth to the governor, by the custom of this place, a certain duty upon the goods going from the town into the country, which is usually called the governor's duty, collected by whome he shall appoint, which the last year did amount unto the sum of 31055 guilders, 16 souce, 3 den. which is about 2388 l. 17 s. sterling.

As also the moyety of another duty, which is called ship-money, viz. 30 souce for every great ship above a certain burthen, and 15 souce upon every ship under the said burthen, which the last year did amount unto 406 guilders, 12 souce, 6 den. which is about 31 l. 5 s. 8 d. sterling.

Memorand. That the governor's duties the last year, ending the 30th of June last, did amount unto 2419 l. 18 s. 8 d. sterling.

Of town-duties.

The third sort of publick renewes are such as doe belong unto this town and corporation, which are as followeth :

1st. First, The duty of Octroy, which is about 1 per cent. of all goods coming in and going out of this town, which the last year, ending the 30^o June last, did amount unto 28809 guilders, 7 souce, 11 den. which is about 2216 l. 3 s. sterling.

Memorand. The magistrates of the town do affirm, that $\frac{2}{3}$ parts of the said renew of Octroy are imploied for the fortifications of the old town, and the gates thereof, barracks where the soldiers and troopers do lodg, making of stables for their horses, repairing of the key, courts of guard, &c. and the other third part is imploied in paying the yearly interest of 178600 guilders, which is about 13738 l. sterling principall money, amounting to above 12000 guilders.

Memorand. Wee did make inquiry after the proprietors of the said principall money, whether it or any part thereof did not belong unto any of the subjects of the king of Spain; and the magistrates of the said town did promise to give us an account thereof, but did not perform accordingly; which therefore wee left to be further inquired into by those whom the parliament or your honors shall authorize for that purpose.

Secondly, There belongeth likewise to the town $\frac{2}{3}$ parts of the renew of excise, which the last year, ending the 30. June, 1659, did amount unto as followeth, viz.

	Gilders.	Souce.	Den.
The $\frac{2}{3}$ of the excize of beer	25333	6	8
The $\frac{2}{3}$ of the excize of wyne	15333	6	8
The $\frac{2}{3}$ of the excize of brandy	8333	6	8

49000 guilders amount to about 3769 l. 4 s. 8 d. sterling.

Thirdly, There accreweth also to the town a revenue upon burning wood, amounting unto about 1000 livers per ann. which is about 77 l. sterling, which is paid in part of salary to the treasurer of the town. } 1000 guilders.

Fowerthly, Some small rents belonging to the town amounting per ann. to } 350 guilders.

Fifthly, There is a duty paid to the town by the brewers, viz. 6 guilders for every time the brewers kindle their fire, when they brewed their beer, which did amount to the last year as aforesaid } 1638 guilders.

Lastly, A small duty called ballast-money, which the last year aforesaid did amount to } 97 guilders.

Memorand. The severall sumes of the town revenues aforesaid did amount as followeth, viz.

A.D. 1659.

The duty of Octroy	28809 17 11
The excize of beer, wine, and brandy	49000 00 00
The revenue of burning wood	1000 00 00
The revenue of small rents	350 00 00
The duty of brewers for kindling their fires	16300 00 00
The duty of ballast-money	97 00 00

which said 80894 17 11 is about 6222 l. 13 s. 6 d. sterling.

Memorand. That the said revenues are disposed of per the said town for the maintenance of their government, severall fortifications, the administration of justice, releife of the poore, &c. whether at the discretion of the town, or according to the rules prescribed them by their superiors, we cannot understand.

Memorand. We understand, that the duties aforesaid are imposed upon the goods afore specified, augmented, or diminished, by the town and corporation itselfe, whereunto they have been impowered by the fower states of Flanders, by vertue of authority from the king of Spain; which imposition (if there be no appeall against it within fifteen daies after the first making and publication thereof) is binding; but if there be no appeal within the said time, it is not bynding; for the people concerned therein had about fifteen daies time to make their appeal unto the said states of Flanders, in case they judged it an agre-vance; and the said states of Flanders did allow 6 weekes more unto them to prosecute their said appeale; and in case of appeal and prosecution as aforesaid, the states, upon hear-ing all parties, did determine the same: if there was an appeal, and no prosecution within the time aforesaid, the same imposition was valid and bynding.

Memorand. The government of the town of Dunkirke doth consist of a bailiff, a major, 9 aldermen, 1 treasurer, one town-clerk, and 9 common counsellors.

The major, 9 aldermen, treasurer, and 9 counsellors, are yearly renewed by the com-monwealth of England, or their deputy. The bailiff, 2 recorders, and town-clerk, do remain in their respective places during life.

The office of the bailiff is to put in execution the orders and commands of the state, as also the ordinances and sentences of the magistrates, &c. having for salary (besides perquisites) 556 guilders, as also 81 guilders more for a new gown per ann.

The office of the major and aldermen is to make by-laws for the good of the town, to dis- pose of the revenues, to administer justice criminall and civill, whose sentences in criminall matters have been executable, notwithstanding appeale from whose sentences in civill cases there might be appeals to the parliament, or their deputies.

The major hath yearly 250 guilders, and 81 guilders to buy him a gown.

The 9 aldermen have 156 guilders salary, and 81 guilders apeece to buy them gowns yearly.

The treasurer receiveth all the town revenues, and issues them out according to the vote of the magistrats, having salary 180 guilders, besides 81 guilders yearly for a gown.

The 2 recorders are counsellors to the magistrats to give their advice and assistance in a due and legall administration of justice, and are to attend them upon summons, having for their pains 775 guilders and a gown per peece yearly as aforesaid.

The town-clerk is the register of all proceedings at law, having for his pains severall esta- blished fees out of all causes depending, and the yearly of 156 guilders, and 12 guilders for a gown.

The 9 common-counsellors are to appear upon the summons of the magistrats in certain cases, as in the execution of justice in criminal cases, or otherwise at the discretion of the magi- strates, having for their pains yearly 18 guilders per peece.

Of the town-major's duty.

The fourth and last publick renew of this town is such as doth belong to the town- major.

The town paieth to the said major 50 guilders per menssem, which is 600 guilders per ann. which is about 46 l. 3 s. 2 d. sterling.

Item, He receiveth of every ship coming in laden with wines 6 stoups, which is about fower gallons of wine.

Item, He receiveth of every great vessell above a certain burthen 15 souce, and of every small ship under the said burthen 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ souce, which the last year did amount to 406 guilders, 12 souce, 6 duckets.

Item, All fishermen coming from sea into this harbour with fresh fish doe give the town- major a small quantity thereof, according to the fishermen's pleasure, but without obligation.

Item, Every strainge fisherman coming into the harbour with fresh herrings, are obliged to give him 200 herrings.

Item,

Item, Every billander for every time he goes from the key to the river of Furnes, and from the said river to the key, paieth to the said major 3 souce. A.D. 1659.

Item, He hath one garden scituated out of the Newport-gate, which he letteth for his own use.

Memorand. Whatsoever other claims he makes, not here mentioned, are arbitrary, and without authority.

Memorand. That all the publick revenews of the said town (besides contingent perquesits, &c. before mentioned) did amount unto the last year, ending 30. June last, as followeth :

	Gilders.	Souce.	Den.	l.	s.	d.
The states renew	168991	13	0	12999	7	4
The governor's renew	31462	8	9	2419	18	8
The town renew	80894	17	11	6222	13	6
The town-major's renew besides perquesits	1006	12	6	77	8	10
	282355	12	2	21719	8	4

Concerning the settlement of the revenews of custom and excise, and the regulation thereof for the best advantage of the commonwealth, and the reduction of it (so far as it is practicable) unto the laws and rules used in the port and cittie of London, according to your honour's commands, we humbly offer, that,

Forasmuch as the laws and rules for the collection of excise are made by the town and corporation itselſe, and $\frac{2}{3}$ of the renew thereof accrewing to their own use; and forasmuch as the duties of customs are of divers sorts and kinds, and the revenews thereof belonging some to the state, some to the governor, and others to the town, and all of them very much various, and differing from the laws and rules used in the port and citty of London; and furthermore, Forasmuch as wee could not fynde convenient and sufficient instruments to carry on the affaires hereof, if any such regulation should have been indeavoured to have been made, the present officers (excepting Mr. Delavall, collector) being for the most part Dutchmen, that understand not English, and well acquainted with their present customs and manners, and the rest of the officers English, and ignorant of custom affairs: And, lastly, Forasmuch as it hath been signified to us, that the said town and corporation doth intend to send some of their members shortly into England with an addresse to the parliament, with full power and authority to negotiate and settle the affaires of their corporation, and to acquiesce in what shall be done by them hereabouts, wherein the affairs of custom and excise must come under consideration, any alteration whereof without their compliance and consent upon the reasons aforesaid might be matter of grievance and offence to them: Wee thought good to suspend our endeavours in this kind for the present, judging it more advantageous unto the commonwealth to continue the affaire of custom and excise to the condition and hands as wee found it, presuming, that such a settlement may be made, when the said persons shall come over as aforesaid, and with their compliance, as may be most advantageous for the commonwealth, and satisfactory unto the town and corporation itselſe.

To the right honourable the council of state, appointed by authority of the parliament of England.

THE lords the states generall of the United Netherlands have sent to their subscribed Vol. lxxv. ambassador an extract of their resolution bearing date the $\frac{14}{24}$ of July last past, con-P. 379. taining the nearer agreement or explanation of the treaty concluded at the Hague on the $\frac{11}{21}$ of May last past, concerning the pacification of the kings of Sweden and Denmark, which resolution was forthwith, by severall exprees by sea and land, dispatched to the lords their extraordinary commissioners being in Denmark on the behalf of the said lords the states general, with exprees and positive orders, that they should cause the said articles of the said nearer agreement to be precisely and exactly put in execution: that the said convention or nearer agreement was also sent to the lord of Wassenaer, lieutenant-admiral, for his information, and also with a command and charge, that he should punctually follow and observe the orders, which by the said lords extraordinary commissioners of the United Netherlands, in pursuance of the said nearer agreement, and the before-mentioned resolution, should be given and sent unto him. And as the said lords the states general have proceeded therein with all candour and integrity, so they do expect to hear from their said ambassador, that the like orders, as aforesaid, have been sent on the behalf of the parliament of the commonwealth of England to the lords their extraordinary commissioners and plenipotentiaries in Denmark aforesaid, to the end that the said nearer agreement might by them also be punctually and precisely observed, and caused to be put in execution.

The

A.D. 1659.

The said lords the states general of the United Netherlands have since, on the $\frac{20}{30}$ th of July aforesaid, also resolved and ordered, that it should be proposed on their behalf to the parliament of the commonwealth of England, that to remove fully the present obstruction of the trade and commerce in the Baltic sea and the east countries, that the public ministers of England, France, and the United Netherlands, might use with the kings of Sweden and Poland their joint endeavours, and labour or work officiously to move and to dispose both their majesties, that for the obtaining of a speedy and a sure peace they would refer or remit it to the arbitration or award of the said high renowned three states, to determine the sum of moneys, which should be given by the crown of Poland to the king or crown of Sweden for the evacuation of Prussia; and that thereupon a cessation of hostility should be introduced or established for a competent time, wherein the said award might be pronounced and declared, and the further remaining differences (by the Lord's blessing) might be finally and fully associated and accommodated. Which being of very great concernment for the commerce and navigation of England, and the United Netherlands, considering, that the summer season is already so far gone and elapsed, the said ambassador beseecheth most instantly, that it may also be ordered on the behalf of the commonwealth of England, that all powerful endeavours may be used and employed with the two high renowned kings of Sweden and Poland to the ends aforesaid.

Vol. lxx.
p. 383.

THAT the paper given in to the council by the lord ambassador Nieupoort, of the first of August instant, be humbly offered to the parliament; and that they be also acquainted with the proceedings lately at the Hague between Mr. Downing commissioner from the parliament, and the deputies of the states general, and with the agreement between them by way of explanation of the treaty at the Hague $\frac{11}{21}$ th of May last.

That the copy of the said agreement extracted out of the register of the states general, as it was signed by the said commissioners and deputies, and since agreed unto by the said commissioners, be also reported to the parliament for their approbation, and for the public ratification thereof in convenient season.

That the parliament will be pleased to injoin their members secrecy, as to the particulars of this agreement.

Colonel Lillingston and colonel Allsopp to the council of state.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Dunkirk, 4th August, 1659.

Vol. lxx.
p. 423.

HAVING received a command from the commissioners, at their being here, for a draught of the fortifications of this place, fort Oliver, and the new fort, we have accordingly caused the same to be done at large in a figure, which shall be delivered to your honours by the hands of captain Atherton of this garison; wherein your honours may see, how your money hath been laid out in repairing so many decayed works, and in erecting so many new. The fortifications now on foot are therein also delineated, by all which your honours may the better consider the conveniency and consequence of this place as to trade, peace, or war. It hath been our endeavour to omit nothing absolutely necessary, and to add nothing in our judgment superfluous, that the commonwealth may be well satisfied as to our service, and their own charges. We humbly submit it all to your honours consideration and judgment. We assure your honours, the works now on foot are in a good way of perfecting, but through want of money the workmen sit down, and are wholly discouraged; as also the soldiers both horse and foot much troubled and discontented, because they perceive we have not a penny towards their weekly subsistence, but what we are fain to borrow in the town on our own credit, as we have been forced to do this fortnight; but indeed we know not where to be trusted any longer; and, to keep our soldiers from starving, have been forced now to begin to supply their wants with those small provisions, that are in the stores. Indeed our extreme want of money makes us amazed, and at our wits end; A.D. 1659. for we cannot perform those things, that are just, honest, and most necessary; so that we are a reproach both to friends and enemies. What the consequences thereof may be, your honours can well judge; however, we pay petitioners with good words, as having the like assurances from your honours, and whereon we rely (as we hope) successfully; only do request your honours to use what speed you can in supplying us with money, firing, candle, and winter necessities, because the weather here begins to be very cold and variable already; likewise the other things, which the commissioners have an account of. We lately received some orders from your honours touching prizes brought in hither. We are busy in clearing what ships we can, and do take all possible care, that no ships or men be set out with commissions by any inhabitants here. We wish none might be brought into these roads; for they create to us nothing but trouble, being matters of great contention, and somewhat out of our element; but we shall in all things within our power readily follow your orders, as our instructions to guide us. We have no news here worth your knowledge, nor can we understand, that the enemy hath at present any design on foot against us. We daily send intelligencers into their quarters, where their present discourse is all on the peace, which they hope for betwixt the two crowns, whereof your honours, we conceive, have better knowledge than we. We have heard nothing from our governor these six posts, which is cause of trouble to us, fearing that his letters are intercepted; and do therefore request your honours, that if you have any thing of concernment, relating to the security of this place, to be pleased to communicate it to us with speed; and captain Attherton is by us ordered to attend your honours commands in that particular. It is our desire to you to be pleased to dispatch away the commissions of our officers, which will be some encouragement to them. Our three regiments, which lately came forth of the French king's service, lie yet encamped near the town. They seem to be much troubled, that no course is taken for them, by reason they are wholly forth of the French pay; and here is nothing to be got but for ready money, and that at a very dear rate. We most humbly intreat you to take all the particulars herein into serious consideration, that the forces here may be supplied with necessities fit for them, that thereby, through the assistance of God, we may be enabled to give your honours and our nation a faithful and good account of this garison for your use. We have nothing further, but to crave and expect your comfortable answer, and to pray Almighty God to bless your counsels with good success; and we remain,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Your most obedient and most faithful servants,

HEN. LILLINGSTON.

ROG. ALLSOPP.

An intercepted letter of lord Inchiquin.

Paris, 14th of August, 1659. [N.S.]

I HAVE received yours of the 26th of August. I have reason to fear, that I shall not now hear frequently from you, being to begin my journey towards the place you advise me to go within three days; and I assure you, I carry with me as much sadness and despair of ever seeing my friends again as can be: yet expectations are given me of being employed by Mr. Hope in Picardy, once within six months, Mr. Stoane and Mr. Harbert having promised to join with him for that purpose; but I know not, whether I may presume they will do it; for Mr. Howard, who hath the most power with them, I doubt, is not so well inclined to serve Mr. Hope as he was. Write no more, till I give you an address, which will not be till I arrive at my journey's end,

In the possession of the right hon. Philip lord Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great-Britain.

THE subscribed embassador of the lords the states general of the United Netherlands, hath received last night their secret resolution, bearing date the fifth of August, 1659; whereby the articles agreed on at the Hague the day before (a copy whereof is hereunto annexed) are thereby approved and confirmed: and in pursuance thereof, express orders have forthwith been dispatched with all possible speed, to the extraordinary commissioners of the said United Netherlands, sent to the kings of Sweden and Denmark, that they are to cause the contents of the said articles, precisely according to the form and tenor thereof, to be put in execution. The same articles so agreed on have also been sent to the lord of Wassenaer lieutenant-admiral, and to colonel Puchler, requiring them to execute and to perform punctually the orders, which shall be given unto them by the said extraordinary commissioners. The said lords the states general have also written to the said subscribed embassador, that they do trust and expect, that the parliament of the commonwealth of England will forthwith also dispatch the like orders, and to the same effect, that the said last agreement may be observed and precisely executed by their commissioners and plenipotentiaries being in Denmark; and that he the said embassador should with all speed advertise the lords the states general thereof.

POUR ne rien omettre de tout ce qui pourra servir à l'avancement de la paix entre les deux couronnes septentrionales, celle de Dennemarc a bien voulu, sans perdre aucun moment de temps, satisfaire au desir des Messieurs les mediateurs, en s'expliquant sur le point de la satisfaction, qu'elle pretend luy estre due, pour les despeses et dommages causez aux estats de la dite couronne, par l'irruption, que le roy de Suede y a faite, et pour la restitution, qui du dit roy n'a point esté faite conformement au traité de Roehilde; à sçavoir, qu'elle demande la restitution des terres et provinces, tant celles qu'elle a cy-devant cedée à la couronne de Suede, que celles que le roy de Suede en occupe à present: et d'autant qu'il est fort raisonnable, que la satisfaction due à la couronne de Dennemarc, apres qu'elle a esté injustement assaillée du roy du Suede, ne soit pas moindre, mais au contraire plus grande que celle que la dite couronne a esté obligée de donner n'agueres à celle de Suede pour terminer une guerre, qu'elle luy avoit justement declarée et faite, la dite couronne de Dennemarc a tant de confiance en l'equité de Messieurs les mediateurs, qu'en un affaire si juste ils maintiendront ses intérêts.

WE are humbly bold, as our bounden duty, to let you know the state of affairs here, that is, that, blessed be the Lord, all things are in a peaceable and quiet condition amongst us; only, as we hinted to you in our last, we are in exceeding want of money, as well for the soldiers weekly subsistence, as for the satisfying in some measure the workmen, who are employed in the fortifications, which are now near done, and the work-masters are much in arrears to those, whom they employ to work under them; so that we have much to do to keep them at the works to finish what is begun, without which doing it had been better we had not begun with our out-works: and besides we want, by the least, 20000 palisadoes to set about those works, which will also cost us a considerable sum of money; and that being completed, we question not (but by the assistance of our God) to give you and our nation a good account of this garison, you supplying us with men, and provisions of moneys and other things for their encouragement. Sir Bryce Cockram came hither last night about four of the clock, and gave orders to the drums of the three field regiments to beat, for to ship the men away for England; which was done, but in so much confusion, (notwithstanding that he carried it high, laying commands upon us to serve him much like unto servants) fervants) that this garison has suffered much prejudice thereby, by their carrying away near A.D. 1659.

 200 of our soldiers, much to the weakening of our small number. We afforded him and the rest all the assistance imaginable. We spoke to the officers, desiring them, that they would be very cautious in carrying away any of our soldiers; and they promised us, that they would carry away none; but upon inquiry how many are missed out of each regiment and company, we find wanting near about the number aforesaid. Indeed it could not be well prevented by us, by reason of their being shipped by night; but by information of some of our officers we hear, that many of our soldiers were disguised (in their cloaths, &c. without red coats) by some officers of those regiments, on purpose to deceive us. Our number of foot here amounteth not to above 2500 fighting men, which is a very weak garison for this place with its forts. We made it our desires to the commissioners, that there might be a recruit for these three regiments, to complete them to the number of three thousand, which will be a good ordinary garison for this place; and with fewer we dare not promise you to keep it, if we should be besieged; but with that number, and the regiment of horse, we hope, through the assistance of the Lord, we shall be able to give you such an account thereof, as may become honest men, and persons fit to be intrusted with the charge of the garison. Here are four companies, (two of colonel Salmon's, and two of colonel Gibbons's regiments) who are in a very longing condition to be relieved from hence, their regiments being in England; and the truth is, they are but weak, and daily weaker by their soldiers dropping away for England. Sir Bryce Cockram told us, that he had some private instructions to acquaint us with, which was, that there were 10000 shipped somewhere, designed for this country; but he told it us so, that we want skill to understand what he said; so that we are bold to intreat you, that if you have any commands for us of consequence to this place, that you will be pleased to let us know it in writing, or by the hands of such as have not acted against you; and that you will be pleased not to believe every thing, that shall be said to you by those, who have been in actual arms against you: but if you desire to be acquainted with any thing of your concernment here, that you will receive it from such as you know have acted all along both with you and for you, and are not to be blemished by any imputation, that may be laid upon them by flatterers and designers, and such as put on a cloak of religion to cover their unworthiness. We make bold to send this expresse by the hands of captain Guy, deputy town-major of this garison, who will acquaint you more at large with all things of concernment to this place, as well of the money, which we have borrowed of the magistrates here, as that of fire, candle, provisions, and other necessaries, which we are in great want of. We believe this place to be of much concernment to the weal of our nation, which makes us to be so bold and urgent with you at this time for supplies. So praying God to give you wisdom to manage your affairs in these troublesome times, and to own you, and bring your work to perfection to his glory and the comfort of our nation, assuring your honours, that none shall be more ready than we to lay down our lives, and all that is dear to men, for the preservation of this place for your use, we humbly salute you, and remain,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Your honours most humble servants,

HEN. LILLINGSTON,
 ROGER ALLSOPP.

We have received about 1300 l. for the use of this garison, which we shall husband the best we can amongst the soldiers and workmen, and give your honours all humble thanks for your care and willingness to help us, though we owe to Mr. Delavall above ten thousand livres for the use of the garison, since the commissioners departure, which we were forced to borrow of him, particularly for the use of the garison, besides what we owe to the town's-people.

Resolved, &c.

From the English commissioners in the Sound.

MY LORD,

In the possession of the right honourable Philip lord high chancellor of Great Britain.

WHEN we were ready to go to our audience from the king of Sweden, which, by our last dispatch of the twenty-ninth of July, we informed your lordship we expected the next day, we received a message from his majesty, whereby it was deferred until the thirty-first, with a promise we should be heard publicly in the morning, and privately in the afternoon.

The public audience passed in the ordinary ceremony, we speaking in English, and delivering what we had said in English in Latin, the king answered immediately in the Swedish language, and Mr. Berkman related in English what he had said. After the second or third speech of that kind, the king did in French civilly excuse himself for the ill entertainment we had received, the disorders of the time and streightness of the place not admitting of better. Our answer was then in French; but nothing passed more than ordinary civilities. In the afternoon we were admitted to a private audience, wherein in the French we did express the cause of our coming, proposed a treaty between him and the king of Denmark, and the nomination of time, place, commissaries, and granting of safe conducts and a cessation during the time of, and our preparations unto the treaty. Unto which he answered in the same language, That he had by his several declarations sufficiently evidenced his desires of peace; and that he did leave it to the English to chuse whether it should be general or particular with Denmark. Then he made a very large narrative of all the streights, in which he had found himself ever since he came to the crown, the multitude of enemies wherewith he was oppressed, his own desires of peace, both for the necessity of his affairs, and infirmities of his body; but that he could not nominate commissaries, time, or place, nor grant safe conduct or cessation, until he knew whether the king of Denmark would treat: that he did not comprehend his allies. And concerning the cessation, he added, that the other things being once accorded, he would grant that also; but upon such conditions, as neither wood, victuals, or other necessities, that they wanted in Copenhagen, should be brought into that town during that time. With this answer we returned to Elsinore the same day. The first of August we had a conference with the Holland ambassadors there concerning our common affairs, and resolved all together to go to Copenhagen the second of August, to propose the same thing to the king of Denmark. Public audience was given to us on the third in the morning, which passed in the same manner as that of Sweden; only the king's answer was first made unto us by Peter Rytz (who was formerly ambassador in England) in the Dutch tongue, and then in Latin. In the afternoon we had a private audience with the king, having with him the rix-hoffmaster Rytz, and three other senators. We proposed the same points concerning peace, treaty, and cessation. The answer was delivered by the rix-hoffmaster in French, (as our discourse had been) that the peace of Roschild having

 the countries wasted, king's houses pillaged, others destroyed, and the king forced to shut himself up in one city, which being unprovided of all things necessary for defence and unfortified, had been hitherto maintained by a particular blessing of God, protecting an oppressed king and an innocent people; and that the said king had ever been desirous of peace, and forced by so many urging necessities to call the emperor, king of Poland, and duke of Brandenburg to his assistance, he did desire, that they might also be comprehended in the treaty, that being by us impossible to be effected in the short time, that was allotted to us, and that our fleet could stay here. We pressed him for a particular peace. Some discourses passed on the same subject on both sides, and so we parted, giving the king time to consider of it until the next day. We then returning, the rix-hoffmaster told us, that the king, finding himself more nearly allied to the duke of Brandenburg than any of his other allies, had dispatched a messenger unto him, to know whether he desired to be comprehended in the treaty or not; and that having done all that was in his power for him, and to persuade him, if he did refuse, he would proceed to treat with Sweden without him. Our business not admitting so much delay as the return of the messenger, we pressed for an immediate and particular treaty upon the grounds of that of Roschild. The hoffmaster answered, That the treaty of Roschild did injoin the king of Sweden to deliver into the hands of the king of Denmark the provinces of Jutland and Holstein, which he did doubt would be hard for the Swede to do; and that if the Dane should treat without his allies, and peace should not ensue upon it, he should be deserted by them, and his condition made much worse than it is at present. We replied, that the treaty of Roschild could intend only, that the king of Sweden should not detain those provinces from the Dane, which he now easily performed, not having a man in them; and that they being in the hands of the king of Denmark's allies, we could not but judge them to be in his own, not doubting but that his majesty had chosen such to call to his assistance, as would consider his interest, and be guided by his directions.

And these difficulties being thus removed, we did desire to know of his majesty, whether he did like the conditions of the treaty of Roschild; and if he did not, he would nominate his commissioners, agree upon the preliminaries, and give them instructions upon those points, that he did desire should be added, diminished, or changed; and we would endeavour by our mediation to obtain for his majesty so much as should appear to be just. The king and senators scrupled much to enter into a treaty with the Swede, affirming positively, that as soon as that was known, all his allies would turn against him; but offered to treat with us, who might go between, hear the pretences of both parties, and terminate the differences between them. We finding this way suitable to our instructions, and the most probable to put a speedy end to the business, the disputes of titles, precedence, time, place, powers, persons, and great animosities between the parties (which were likely to take up much more time than was allotted to us for the conclusion of the whole) being thereby avoided, we readily accepted that proposition; and that we might bring it to effect, we desired to know, what the king desired should be altered of the Roschild treaty, which we promised the next day. And on the fifth in the morning, the rix-hoffmaster, and five other senators, which were then in town, came to our lodgings, and made us a discourse, of which the subject is contained in the first of these inclosed papers; and in the afternoon Peter Rytz brought it us in writing. On the sixth we had another conference with the Holland ambassadors, and they afterwards had one with the Danish senators; upon which Peter Rytz brought in this second paper, and in discourse told us much of the weakness of his master, the cruelty and unfaithfulness of the Swede, their dependence upon the mediators, principally upon the English, for making the peace, wherein he did desire us to consider, not only the just cause of an oppressed prince, but our own interest, which was nearly concerned in maintaining Denmark, to be a balance to the power of Sweden; which being once taken away, and he getting the intire mastery of the Sound and the Baltic sea, would prove troublesome to all his neighbours, which should have occasion to trade there. Unto which we returned no other answer, than that it was not our work to oppress the king of Denmark, but rather to make such a peace for him, as might consist with justice, and the present condition of the affairs of those states interested in this quarrel and the commerce in those seas; and that we would omit no care and diligence in using such means as were probable to effect it. The next day, being the seventh, we returned to Elsinore. The eighth in the morning, two of us, viz. Honywood and Sydney, went to Fredericksburg, and immediately desired audience of the king of Sweden, who excused himself for not giving a personal audience, by reason of an indisposition, into which he was lately fallen; but would immediately appoint two senators to hear whatsoever we had to propose; which we accepted, though we knew well enough, that that was only a feigned pretence, upon an ill humour, into which he was grown, upon a dislike of the agreement at the Hague, our communication with the Holland ministers, and his opinion, that we had an intention to

A.D. 1659. oblige him to a peace, that he did not like. At the place appointed, we found two senators, two secretaries, and two other clerks; and whilst we were intent in discourse, not regarding them, writ all that we said, which (though we thought a very unhandsome way of proceeding) we did not complain of; but took care not to say any thing, that could give them an advantage. We proposed the treaty to be managed between both parties by the mediators, without losing time in frivolous disputes upon the preliminaries and other points subject to raise cavils; but that if the king of Sweden would deliver us in writing his acceptance of the Roschild treaty, or his exceptions unto it, we would communicate it with the other mediators, and endeavour to procure such a peace for his majesty, as was suitable to the rules of honour and justice, adding thereunto many expressions of civility to his majesty from the commonwealth, and from ourselves.

They argue much against this way of proceeding, and we for it, as the only one, that could possibly bring the business to effect in the time, that our fleet could stay here. They promised us to make report to his majesty, and bring us a speedy answer. In the evening a gentleman came from them, to know at what time the next day, being the ninth, they might bring an answer to what we had proposed: we named eight in the morning. The two senators and two secretaries came accordingly, and refused to treat otherwise than by commissaries: we knowing that to be only a trick to delay the peace, until the English and Holland fleets should be forced to retire, did not accept of that, but sent to desire again audience from the king. He returned the like answer as the day before, offering also to appoint commissaries to hear whatsoever we should impart; but we finding that ending in nothing but loss of time in vain talking, having communicated our instructions to the Holland ambassadors, (who came with us, and had been used in the same manner) sent his majesty this inclosed letter, and immediately returned hither. This day we spend in making this dispatch, and framing a project of a treaty upon the grounds of the agreement made at the Hague, which we intend to offer unto the two kings, and to proceed according to our instructions against the refuser. To-morrow the Hollanders, and two of us, viz. Honywood and Sydney, intend to go to Copenhagen to begin with the Danish king, and then return to the Swede, hoping to find him in a better and more prudent temper than we left him. And though he did rage and storm horribly upon the news he heard from the Hague, (which was a little before we came unto him) he finds all his council against him; and that such courses are of little force against those, who are not at all in his power. We hear, that he hath found reason to appease his choler; but the answer, which we have now received and sent inclosed to your lordship, doth not at all shew him to be much mended. We think it also our duty to inform your lordship, that upon consideration of the condition of our fleet, we find, that reserving one month's victuals for their return into England, they cannot stay here beyond the two or three-and-twentieth of August; and do doubt, that if the whole should return at that time, two great inconveniencies might follow; the one, that your lordship would be pressed to find money to pay them; and the other, that if no English force remain here to see the treaty executed, or to enforce the acceptance of what should be agreed by the mediators upon the refuser or refusers thereof, the whole fruition of the charge of this summer will be utterly lost, and the English will depend wholly upon the will of the Hollander and Dane, who will be able, as they please, to force the king of Sweden to an union with them, perhaps to our prejudice. We have therefore thought it the best expedient, that about fifteen of our ships do remain here, and a proportionable number of Hollanders, when all the rest return home; and do desire your lordship to give order, that a proportionable quantity of victuals be provided for that number of ships of the fourth or fifth rate for one month; and by the next, your lordships shall exactly know the number of men in every one of them; and that it may be here by the end of September to bring them back about that time, if the business can possibly be so soon settled; or that your lordships would be pleased to send so many others of the lately set out ships, as may serve here for that use. We should before now have agreed upon this course with the Holland ministers; but they had no power for that purpose, until within these two days. We do also humbly desire your lordship's order how to deal with the king of Swedes, if the refusal of the peace be on his side, as we believe it will, he having beside these inclosed papers, by message, desired us to mediate with the king of Denmark, that as a mark of his desiring peace, he would release the Swedish ambassador, that he hath kept prisoner ever since the last breach, without which he would admit of no treaty. But, we hope, he will be better advised than every day to come with new propositions to put off the treaty, and doubt not but that will be effected, if the Hollanders do faithfully perform the commands of their superiors, which they do very freely communicate unto us, and in all things seem very heartily to join in procuring a peace here upon the grounds agreed at the Hague, without seeking for their own nation any advantage but what they desire should be granted to the English. We desire your lordships pardon for this long and tedious letter, which could not be avoided, but by omitting the particulars of all things, that had passed here between the several princes, and their their ministers and us, which would have made our relation imperfect, and less easy to your lordships to send us such certain and positive orders, as we desire, and shall ever be punctually observed by, A.D. 1659.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

MY last to your honors was of the twenty-eighth of the last moneth, sent expres by sea, in which I made it my humble supplication to have libertie to returne for some time into England in reference to my private occasions. I have nothing at present, but with al earnest and submissive instance to renew the same supplication, my longer stay heer being very much to my particular prejudice, and contributes nothing to the publick service. As soon as your honors shal graciously please to grant me leave, and I have advice thereof, which I beg may be by the soonest, I shall, God willing, embarque myself upon the first vessel, that shall be sent from the fleet to England. My lords the plenipotentiaries wil acquaint your honours fully with all publique transactions, to whom I crave leave to refer you, and remain most humble and faithful servant,

YOUR HONORS

Draught of a letter, and instructions to general Montagu, &c.

SIR,

11. Aug. 1659.

AFTER consideration of the treaty of the Hague $\frac{11}{21}$. of May instant, and after conference with the lord embassador of the United Provinces upon some proposals here- with sent, and upon assurance, that he will send the like directions to the commanders of the Dutch fleet, and advertisement to the public ministers of the United Provinces sent to the Sound upon that treaty, and procure from his superiors, that they shall also ratify and send the same with all possible speed from the Hague; the council have promised to the embassador, and do accordingly send to you, and to . . . these following instructions: Vol. lxx. p. 437.

I. That you shall, in pursuance of the seventh article of the treaty at the Hague, contribute your utmost endeavours for the taking away of all misintelligences, which have arisen betwixt the king of Sweden and the United Provinces; and to that purpose, that you endeavour the treaty concluded at Elbing $\frac{1}{11}$. September, 1659. together with its elucidations, as the commissioners of the said king agreed to them at Thorn, may be ratified, and perfectly and throughout fulfilled; and that you take care, that the benefit of the treaty at Elbing, and the elucidations at Thorn, be effectually and equally provided for in the behalf of this commonwealth as of the United Provinces.

II. You shall, in pursuance of the third article of the treaty at the Hague, forbear to join the fleet under your command to the navy of either of the kings of Sweden or Denmark, or to give any aid to either of them, or to use any act of hostility against either of them, not only for the three weeks mentioned in the said treaty, as immediately subsequent to the notification of the treaty at the Hague to you, but also for other three weeks immediately following the expiration of the former three weeks; and that during the last three weeks above-mentioned, you shall endeavour the peace between the two Northern kings upon the foundation of the treaty agreed at Roschild, and the keeping a good correspondence between the two fleets of the commonwealth of England and the United Provinces.

III. You shall co-operate with the commander in chief of the fleet, and other the public ministers of the United Provinces, in soliciting the two Northern kings, during all the time

A.D. 1659. time of the last three weeks afore-mentioned, to abstain from acts of hostility one against another by sea.

And if that cannot be obtained, yet you shall endeavour, that the king of Sweden abstain, during that time, from all acts of hostility against any of the ships belonging to the fleet of the United Provinces, or their merchant-ships.

IV. In case the instructions herein mentioned to be agreed to be sent from the ambassador of the United Provinces to the commander in chief of the fleet, and other the public ministers of the United Provinces, (a copy whereof are herewith sent you) shall not be by them fully ratified, observed, and fulfilled, then you are at liberty to observe and prosecute such other instructions, as you have already received in that behalf, or shall receive from us.

Agreed, that this shall be matter of your letter and instructions to be sent to general Montagu, and the English commissioner Sir Philip Meadowe.

That the committees formerly appointed, or any two of them, do communicate the matter of these letters and instructions to the Dutch ambassador, to the end, that the ambassador may have the perusal thereof, and may in like manner communicate of these letters and instructions to the general of the Dutch fleet, and the public ministers there to the council, on monday, for their consideration.

That the committee of the council appointed to confer with the lord ambassador of the United Provinces upon the propositions sent thither, or any two of them, do deliver to the said ambassador a copy of what hath this day been agreed upon of the matter of their letter and instructions, to be sent to the and their commissioners in the Sound, and to confer with him thereof, to the end, that the said ambassador may in like manner communicate to the council, on monday next, the matter of this letter and instructions to the commander in chief of the fleet, and the other public ministers of the United Provinces, for the council's consideration.

DEAR SIR,

Dunkirk, 12. August, 1659.

Vol. lxx.
P. 445.

* Sir George Booth's.

YOUR first letter to us of the eighth of this current month we have received, whereby we understand the great care you have taken for us to the council; for which we acknowledge ourselves much bound to you. How the success thereof hath been obstructed by the present rebellion *, the evil whereof we are made very sensible of through the love we bear to our country, and the wants of all necessities, which we lie under, we hope the Lord will continue his favour towards his people, that the enemy may be suddenly extinguished, and bear the reward of their malice, that so the care of this place may be renewed, where, God be praised, all things are in a very quiet and peaceable condition, and the employments, that are chiefly for money, whereof the soldiers and officers stand in great need, as also the workmen, who having almost finished all the works, that you ordered to be done, cannot get their people to work any longer. The next want we begin to feel is of coals and firing. We shall also need store of oats, and all the other particulars, whereof we gave you account; also two months stores of provisions, we being now forced to pay the soldiery part of their weekly subsistence out of the stores through the great want of money. Indeed, unless we have these supplies suddenly, we nor any rational man can promise to serve this place, being always to stand merely on our own strength. The enemy, having been lately abroad, hath plundered the country about us; and how his designs now or hereafter may be laid, we must believe are for his own good and not ours. Wherefore we request you to use your utmost endeavour with all your friends in the council, that these supplies may be forthwith sent us, that so we may be enabled, by God's blessing, to give an honest and good account of this place to the parliament. So not doubting of your sensibility of all our wants and necessities, we commit you and your affairs to the blessing of the Almighty, and remain,

DEAR SIR,

Your very humble servants and friends,

HEN. LILLINGSTON,
ROG. ALSOPP.

To the council of state.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Dunkerke, 15. August, 1659.

SINCE our last, the condition of this place is still (God be praised!) quiett and peaceable, A.D. 1659. and the only trouble upon our spirits is, that through the rebellion of the old enemy we have hetherto been hindred of those supplyes, which the commissioners, at their being here, ^{Vol. lxx.} assured us of. We hope by this time the Lord hath put a hook into the nose of ^{P. 451.} inveterate adversary, and that he will give them the reward of their malice; and that wee may here allso secure this place to your use against all attempts, wee humbly make bould (as wee have often formerly done) to desyre your honours for speedy supplyes of our extraordinary necessities; viz. coales, candles, ammunition, fower demy-cannon, at least, to secure the harbour, (that being the place the enemy will first attempt) two months provisions of biskett, cheefe, butter, &c. wee haveinge been forced some weeks to allow the soldiers their subsistence out of the provisions; not haveinge money to give them two thousand quarter of oates for the house, and to bee paid for by them out of their pay; 200 case of pistolls for the magazine to supply such as shall be broke or lost in service; 600 belts and fwyvells for the carbynes, there being none here, nor any dellivered at first; five or six hundred pounds to buy horses for those, whose horses have dyed here; for we perceive, the horses of this country are not so subject to mortality, as those that come from England: and most especially, and above all, supplyes of moneyes for the arreares of the soldiers, officers and workmen, to whom wee are in extreame debt for the fortifications of fort Ollyver, that new fort betwixt it and this towne, and the fortifications about this towne: beysides that wee must buy at least twenty thousand pallisadoes for all these fortifications; and for want of moneyes there is soe great a murmuring, that the workemen cannot be perswaded to end what is soe near finished, as indeed all the fortifications and the new fort are; as are also the three newe halfe-moones, and the three spurs on the east end of the towne. Wee humbly thank your honours for the 1300 l. sent to us lately; though wee assure you, wee had already borrowed as much here, since the commissioners went, for to supply our urgent necessities. Wee do assure your honours, with these supplyes timely sent, wee shall be able to give a good account of this place for your use; but if wee have not these things, and the other necessities, (whereof the particulars were delivered to the commissioners) wee cannot answere what you may perhaps expect of us, though wee perish in the defence of this place, which our ambition and desire is to perpetuate to our nation, as a goade in the sides of their enemyes, and to secure our footing in the continent of Europe, lost ever since queene Marye's days, and now regayned; and doubtless we ought to preserve that carefully, which the Lord hath given us soe graciously. Wee lykewise desire to prove your resolutions as to the forte of Mardyke, which must be slighted or repayred; and when three or four thousand pounds is disburst to repayre it, it cannot hold out above ten or twelve days against an enemy. Wee made bold to give you our opinion to have a stone fort erected instede thereof, which may be framed in the isle of Portland, where the stone growes, and may be brought over, and sett upp here, which wee judge will bee invincible, and will both bee made and kept at lesse charges. Lastly, wee cannot conceale the great regret that wee have, to understand, that dyvers officers here, by some unworthy persons, have beene traduced to your honours, though wee know them to bee men, that have all along served you faithfully and cordially. Wee cannot believe, that your honours will bee ready to beleieve detractors, but rather to credit our testimony; for wee assure you, that if we did conceive or suspect any officer of this garrison not fitt for his command, either in respect of his fidelity or conversation, wee should bee most ready, according to our duty, to informe your honours: but truly we beleieve, there are not in all your armyes men, that have demeaned themselves with more fidelity, courage and modesty, both in England and here, wherein those, that backbite them, have been wanting too apparently. In a deepe sence of this grievance, our officers have desyred leave of us to petition the parliament; and wee should think ourselves much wanting in our duty to them and our nation, if wee should not beare testimony for them, whom the Lord hath owned and upheld from backsyding, against the fawning flatteryes of those, who, under a cloake of religious purity, are soe themselves, as to think, by such indirect wayes, to seduce your honours; whom, wee knowe, never will credit men, that have failed in their allegiance against those, that have to this day continued firme to you against all temptations of tymes and persons.

Wee have received an order, signed by your clerke, dated the tenth of this month, for the restoreing or secureing all ships and goods, belonging to the United Provinces, brought in hether by any subjects of this commonwealth, which is already done, as wee formerly advised your honours; and that wee shall suffer noe vessell, so brought in, to continnew in our harbour or roade, so far as wee can prevent it. Yesterday came in a hoy

A.D. 1659. bound for the Sound, but taken by a Swede man of war, wherein are many letters sent by friends to their relations in the Dutch fleet in the Sound; wherein they signifie, that the fleet is to lye forth all the next winter, a perfect account whereof wee cannot yett give you, but hope to find some letters, which may tend to your advantage, whereof wee shall advise you by our next. Wee are certainly informed, that a ship, laden with pistols, musketts, and other fyre-armes, sett sayle from Calais to some part of England; but whether, wee knowe not: wee also heare, that the duke of Yorke, Marlin lieutenant-general to the prince of Condé, and some other gentlemen, were mett upon the roade, nere St. Omer's, on the way to Calais, about 4 days agoe. The prince of Condé's army hath exacted new and great contributions and taxes on the people hereabouts; and it is generally reported, that they intend for England, which new levyes of mony is against the articles of the cessation, as wee have seene them printed. See craveing pardon for this prolixity, and praying to God for a blessing on your counsells, and for peace to our nation, wee remayne,

WE received yours of the 13th current, wherein you are pleased to acquaint us, that we have received some wrong information concerning the reducing the six regiments into four; and truly, Sir, we are bold to let you know, that if the parliament, who have the immediate command of us, and that which is now in our charge, may not think fit to make further use of us, or many of those with us, we must and do confesse with you, that that of the sword is no inheritance; and we shall as freely and willingly, at the pleasure of the parliament, lay down our swords and commands, as we accepted of them in the service of our country against the public enemy; and so, we do believe, will most of those now under our commands. But we think it something hard, that the information of such should be taken against us, or any with us, who we know have been in actual arms against us, for and on behalf of that implacable enemy, the enemy of our nation. We ourselves are known to you, and to most of those in power in England, and those under our commands are as well known to us; and, as we acquainted you, when you were here, what we know of every individual person, so we again do acquaint you, that those, whom we have given in to you as persons fit to be employed in their country's service, are such as we believe will scarce be better'd by any that should be sent hither; but that we shall freely leave to the parliament, and those entrusted by them, who have the dispose of things here. We are in exceeding great want of moneys for the soldiers subsistence, and to pay the workmen in the fortifications, to whom we are very much in debt. We have made a shift to pay out of your 1300 l. which you sent us, above 4000 l. since you went from hence: in short, we have borrowed so much of Mr. Delaval chiefly, and others, that we know not where to borrow more. Our bill being protested, which we drew upon you, hath very much impaired our reputation. We are all in a peaceable condition, and our works almost finished; but we must again acquaint you, that we are ready to hide our heads in any hole for want. We are sorry to hear of the continuance of your troubles; but more glad to hear, that it is no higher, or spread no farther. So with our prayers to almighty God for you, do remain,

MY LORDS,

GENERAL Mountaigne having thought fitt to returne into England with the wholle Vol. lxx.
 fleet, I esteeme it necessary for me, not only to testify unto your lordships, that P. 431.
 did in noe wayes assent unto that resolution, but to give you the reasons, why I did endeavour to hinder it.

First, Wee had noe positive order to send back the whole fleete untill forty dayes after our arrivall, of which about nine are yet wanting; nor implicate, untill the businesse is done, for which wee came, and the treaty of peace concluded and executed.

Secondly, Wee have an order, after the 15 dayes are expired, one or both kings refusing or accepting the peace, to enforce the acceptance, or see the execution, which now wee cannot doe.

Thirdly, By the retirement of the whole fleet, the agreement made at the Hague, ratified by parliament, is broken; the charge of this summer lost; the interest of the commonwealth in theis parts endangered; the Swede exposed to be destroyed by the Dutch, or compelled to joine with them in a league against the English; which they may conclude, without breaking faith with us, the first breach having bin one our side, whoe, instead of assisting them to make peace, leave them engaged in a warre.

Fourthly, That by continuing a fleet of about 16 ships victualled with a moneth's sea provisions, which, at short allowance, lasts six weeks; and three weeks of fresh provisions, which might be had heare for 1500 l. that a merchant heare did offer to lend upon a note from the generall, my colleagues, and myself, wee might have accomplished the ends aforesaid, and continued here, as occasion should have required, or your lordships orders direct.

Lastly, The scruple being the danger of leaving 16 ships within the power of the Hollander, it is answered, that the ministers heare have not yet received any orders to send back part of their fleete, but doe every day expect them. In the meane time they offer joine such a part of their fleet with ours, as we shall thinke fit to enforce the peace under the command of our admirall; and that the rest shall continue in any part of all theis seas, that wee shall desire; attempt nothing, but with our consent; and, for making good of this, doe offer their owne persons to be kept on board our ships as hostages, and to take away further scruples did yesterday agree with us, that the joint force should be used against either of the tow kings, only untill he assents unto the conditions of peace proposed; that nothing shall be attempted against either of them, but with the consent of the ministers of both commonwealths; and that neither of them should make peace with either of the kings without the consent of the other.

I could not satisfy myself without representing this unto your lordships. If I have given you an unnecessary trouble, I hope your lordships will be pleased to pardon me, my zeale for the commonwealth's service being the inducement, and my desire to obey your lordships commands, which shall ever be a rule not to be transgressed by

P. 499.

THIS is to let you know, that captain Guy, deputy town-major of this garison, hath acquainted us, that your honour have been pleased to favour this garison, by acting for it becoming a person of honour, and one that is truly sensible of the consequence of such a place; and that were there noe more use in the keeping of it, than the honour and reputation of our country, it being the only footing, that the commonwealth hath upon the continent of Europe, we are therefore humbly bold to return your honour all humble and hearty thanks for your care of us; but without doubt this garison is of more than ordinary consequence to the republic of England, for your having and being able to maintain it against any enemy or enemies, it will prove to be, in our judgment, a great check upon any such as shall have a mind to quarrel with you. But you may be pleased to consider, that a garison of its consequence cannot be maintain'd and kept without such accommodation as must necessarily be had for the keeping thereof; and more especially, when you duly consider, that those, who now pretend to be our friends, will without doubt take their advantages against us, to possess themselves of this place; and you may also consider, that in the time of these broils and troubles in England, the enemy sleeps not in this place also, but we are afraid hath his agents here as well as in other places: and we are informed by our intelligencers, that the enemy (we mean Charles Stuart and his allies) hope to take their advantage by our soldiers not being paid; and we are truly afraid, that it is so indeed, by the effects of things here. It hath been frequently reported in this garison, that James Stuart, the titular duke of York, is raising forces at Brussels, and other parts of this country, and promiseth such as come in to him ten shillings a man advance, with five shillings a week, and ammunition bread. We find, that it hath in some measure taken with some of our rudest soldiers; for we have lost fourteen or sixteen within these two or three days, and we cannot find out, which way they should be gone, except it be to James Stuart. You may believe, that our soldiers are not so well principled, as becomes good men to be; but that many of them make money their cause. So having given your honour an account of our thoughts, and those things most material, we are humbly bold to be a little further troublesome to you; that is, in relation to Mr. Delaval, whom the council hath been pleased to send for. He is a person so useful in this place, that we cannot with our conveniency be without him long, in relation to his providing us money. We will acquaint you with all things of consequence in this place. We therefore intreat your honour to favour him, and to procure his speedy return to us; and that you will be pleased to remember the necessity of this place, which is great indeed; and to hasten those necessities to us, which we gave the commissioners an account of, when they were here; that is, firing, candles, 3000 links, 2000 quarter of oats, and 4 demi-cannon, with a considerable proportion of powder, small shot and match, and two months provisions of victuals for the garison, without which it will be very hard for us, or men of more knowledge than we, to keep the place, if a powerful enemy should come before it. So craving your pardon for this prolixity, we are humbly bold to subscribe ourselves,

Commissioners in the Sound to secretary Thurloc.

MY LORD,

In the possession of the right hon. Philip lord Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain.

AS soon as we had made our last dispatch of the tenth of this month, two of us, (viz.) Honeywood and Sydney, came to Copenhagen, and pres'd the king of Denmark and his senate upon the two points of declaring, that he would treat with the king of Sweden, and that by commissaries; from whom we did obtain such a declaration as we desired, two senators being therein named commissioners; the king also adding thereunto, that the matter of the treaty should be ripen'd by the mediators, unto whose judgment he did absolutely refer the determination of all differences between the king of Sweden and himself; which was delivered unto us upon this condition, that we should only shew it to the king of Sweden, but not suffer any copy to be taken of it; and in case the peace succeed not, that it should should be returned again into his hand that gave it; which we promised to do. With this A.D. 1659. we returned to Elsinore, thinking our work well advanced; obtain'd an audience from the king of Sweden; shewed him the declaration, unto which he returned answer, Je vous reçois comme mediateurs, non pas comme arbitres; named two senators to be his commissaries, of whom the one call'd Bielk hath been employ'd by him as ambassador in Copenhagen, and upon his last irruption into Zeland had been made a prisoner upon some pretence of practices contrary to the duty of a public minister, and detained until that time; adding many discourses of his apprehensions, that if the peace were made, the king of Denmark, being probably forced unto it, would never keep it; and that he must not omit his own security. This discourse sounding, as if he, concluding that peace upon disadvantageous conditions, was certainly forced, that which was forced would never be kept; the king of Denmark would never part with so large a proportion of his country, if not forced; therefore it was not to be expected he would keep it; and sometimes spoke, as if he would have no peace at all with Denmark. We used what arguments we could draw from the Danes weakness, and the mediating states readiness to interpose, to make good the treaty, to take away that groundless apprehension. But he continued the like discourses, and adding, that he must rely upon his own strength, not the assistance of his friends, for his security; and that having advantages in his hands, it were a great folly to leave them, and depend upon others: it was at last concluded, that his majesty should come to the camp, before this town, the next day, being the 16th of this month; where at a nearer distance he should be better able to discern, whether the Danes assent were voluntary or forced. We then press'd, that Bielk being a prisoner, he would not propose any thing that was likely to obstruct the treaty; that he would have his liberty within a few days upon the article for the general release of prisoners; and desired he would be pleased, whilst the safe conducts and other formalities of the treaty were preparing, to confer with us upon the principal points, that remained in difference between him and the Dane, which in that time we might ripen to be concluded by the commissioners on both sides at their meeting. His majesty insisted upon the nomination of Bielk, and refused to have any discourse with us upon the matter. Our journey was deferred until the 17th by his majesty; on which day he came to his camp, and we to this town, mediated with the king of Denmark for the release of Bielk; obtained it; and the 18th carried him with us to the camp, and there delivered him free unto his majesty. We hoped at the same time for an opportunity of conferring with him upon the business in hand, the ministers of the three mediating states being present; but we were received in a public room full of officers, courtiers, and servants, not at all fit for any discourse, that ought not to be as public as they could make it. But resolving to lose no opportunity, we did offer unto his majesty a paper, of which we send your lordship, here inclosed, a copy, telling him it was drawn by the ministers of the mediating states, and offered unto his consideration. He ask'd what it was, and what it did contain. We answer'd, it was a project of the treaty, which if his majesty would peruse, we hoped would ripen matters against the meeting of the commissioners, and much expedite the work of that so much desired peace. He answer'd, (directing his speech to us) that he did receive us comme mediateurs, non pas arbitres; that he would not receive the project of a treaty, nor treat with any but the king of Denmark: and then turning to the Holland ministers, he told them he look'd upon them as his enemies, and would in no hand admit of their mediation, and in great choler turned away, and went to the other side of the room; and soon after told us, that we made projects upon our fleets, and he, laying his hand upon his sword, had a project by his side. Soon after we took our leaves, and returned to the town, thinking that behaviour something extraordinary to be used to the public ministers of so considerable states; and that his majesty shew'd, he did not well remember, by whose help he hath been maintained all this summer, and enabled to make his conquests, which yet would have appeared more strange unto us, if we had not been accustomed to that, which is suitable unto it. After the first ceremonies of our reception were over, we have been forced to spend these eight days upon frivolous disputes in titles and forms of the safe conducts; which are now passed over, and the commissioners did meet this day. After the usual civilities passed on both sides, in a place midway between two tents, the Danes and the Swedes retired each into their own. Soon after, the Danes went, and offer'd this inclosed paper, consisting of five general propositions. The Swede desires to remove the treaty to Elsinore or Roscheild; unto which neither the Hollanders nor the Danes will consent. To-morrow we intend to offer unto the commissaries of both parties the project, which was first offer'd to the kings severally, and refused by the Swede: it was at first offer'd unto his consideration, but now his consent will be required. The Dane (to avoid the tedious disputes of all the mutations desired by both parties in the treaty of Roscheild) resolve to agree unto them all, unto which one more is to be added for the time of the evacuation of the Swedish forces; and another of amnesty for the inhabitants of Bornholm, who having formerly slain all the Swedish garison, must expect nothing but destruction, if they are not saved by the treaty. On the 22d of this month general Montagu went from hence. This day we hear he

A.D. 1659. is set sail for England with the whole fleet, excepting two frigates and one ketch. This day we received a letter from Sir Phil. Meadowe, wherein he expresth an intention of going into England with the fleet, and desires our advice in it, which we could not give, having no orders, though for many reasons, too long now to relate, we thought he might without prejudice to the commonwealth retire himself out of this public service. None of Mr. Noel's bills of exchange are accepted by de la Bistrade, nor can we get a peny upon his credit. We desire your lordship to be pleased to send us a supply of money or credit, we being obliged to be at an exceeding great expence by making journeys perpetually in a wasted country, and living in a besieged town, where all things are excessively dear; and also that your lordship will let us have your order, how we shall dispose of ourselves, whether the treaty between the two kings can be perfected before winter or not. I HAVE formerly advised your H. and M. lordships of a design here on foot, to prohibit, that none in this kingdom shall import from abroad any train oil, whale-bone oil, &c. than only those of that company now erected, which hath now obtained a patent for it from the court. The said patent or octroy hath been verified and registred in the parliament at Roan, and the business or prohibition hath been put into practice there, and in Normandy, upon certain condition and modification; but in regard it is my duty to take care of the service of your H. and M. lordships state, and the welfare of the good subjects thereof, I thought good to oppose this business underhand; and now I have brought it so far, that the lords of the parliament of Paris have annulled the said patent by arrest or a monopoly prejudicial to the kingdom, and the subjects thereof, and only tending to the advantage of some great persons, to the oppression of the poor commonalty, which do most of all use such commodities. They have forbidden the said farmers to proceed with their design, and have given liberty to all that will to import the said wares; so that now the said commerce is free again to all places and ports in France, except Normandy; whereof I thought it my duty to give your H. and M. lordships notice, to the end their subjects may regulate themselves accordingly.

MY LORD,

I IN regard the parliament hath thought good to authorize the council of state, first to examine the propositions of all foreign ministers, and to refer with their advice, I have proposed to them, as well by writing as by word of mouth, that which their H. and M. lordships have thought good to order me in their resolution of the 10th of August last, concerning themselves and hostilities committed by an English frigate called Portland, and I have delivered their letter writ to the parliament upon that subject; whereupon it was answered by Sir. H. Vane, that I might assure myself, that the council of state would give due order about it, and make appear their good and sincere inclination to the state of the United Netherlands. His lordship said, that by reason of the inland troubles, they had not time to confer further with me concerning the preventing of piracies and insolencies committed at sea by private men of war, but that they would be ready for me within a few days days to resume that business. His honour said, that there were letters from their plenipotentiaries, dated the 10th and 11th of August, old style, which had been communicated to the parliament, who had ordered the council of state to provide with all speed provisions and ammunition for fifteen ships of war of this state, which are to stay in the Sound; that the plenipotentiaries were also fully instructed and ordered concerning the execution of the convention in the Hague; and that the parliament had resolved, that it should be referred to the council of state, to give such order and directions to the lords plenipotentiaries of this commonwealth in the Sound, that they do observe and effect the agreement made between this commonwealth and their H. and M. L. concerning the affairs therein mentioned, if so be the one or both the northern kings do refuse to accept of the same. The Swedish commissioners here are very much discontented, and do all what they can at least to hinder for a time the effect of the said resolution, and order given concerning the same; but, as I am informed, they are put by with this answer, That the parliament itself answered the letter of the king of Sweden; and I am told, that therein was writ with these words, that this present government is not obliged by any treaties or made promises, otherwise or further to the benefit of Sweden, than to use all good offices for the pacifying of that king with the king of Denmark, upon such terms as are proposed by the plenipotentiaries of this commonwealth; advising him, with several reasons, to accept of the presented conditions. So soon as these troubles are over, I will insist upon the sea affairs, and endeavour to make an end thereof.

Whereupon being debated, and consideration had, that the king of Denmark upon the twenty-fourth of the last month, concerning the making of the peace with Sweden, had declared himself in writing, to the content of the ministers of France, England, and this state; but that the said king of Sweden had yet in no wise satisfied the expectation of the three states, it is resolved, the business be referred to the generality, to the end the lords commissioners extraordinary of this state with the kings of Sweden and Denmark be writ unto. that their H. and M. L. trust and believe, that the king of Sweden by further delay or denial shall be forced to it, as well by the power of England as of this state, before the reception of the resolution to be taken by their H. and M. Extract out of the secret resolutions of the lords states of Holland.

Wednesday, 10. Sept. 1659. [N. S.]

THE raedt-pensionary hath reported to the assembly the considerations and advice of their noble great lordships, commissioners for the affairs of Sweden and Denmark. Whereupon being debated, it is resolved, that it be referred to the generality, to the end the lords commissioners extraordinary of this state with the kings of Sweden and Denmark, for a further confirming of the last clause of the convention of the fourth of the last month, may be authorized, in case instance be made by the English plenipotentiaries, for the sending home a part of their fleet; in such a case also, a part of the fleet by provision, not exceeding the number of twenty, shall be dismissed and sent home, in case it be judged, that the number kept there will be sufficient to help to execute the conventions; provided likewise, that the said twenty ships do come away at the same time with the English, or presently after, and not before then; and that they do not exceed the number or strength of the English ships, but equal to them, or less in number than the English ships, that shall be sent home; and that in regard of the long absence of the lord lieutenant-admiral in those parts, as also in regard of his declared inclination, he may be excused from his further stay there; and consequently, that he be ordered to return home with the vice-admirals Egbert, Meews, Cortenaer, and John Evertson.

A letter

A letter of intelligence.

Hague, 10. Sept. 1659. [N. S.]

A.D. 1659. In the possession of the right hon. Philip lord Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain. ONE of the lords commissioners of this state doth write the rencounter of the king of Sweden with the English lords Sydney and Honywood, and the Netherland lords Slingeland and Huybert (the lords Vogellang and Haeren not being present) in this following manner: That the lord Sydney having presented to the king of Sweden the project of peace, made by the three states in a short and full harangue, his majesty did not accept of it, telling the English lords, I accept of you for my mediators, not for my arbitrators, forasmuch as you continue in the terms of good friends; and, for you, (turning himself to the lords Netherland commissioners) I refuse you for my mediators, since you are my enemies. Afterwards, speaking to them all together, he said, You make treaties upon your fleets, and I take my resolutions upon my sword. Afterwards turning from them, he spoke with some of the rix-council and chief officers, who were in great number in the tent. It is to be supposed, that now the fleets, as well the English as those of this state, will act at the expiration of the fifteen days.

De Witt to Nieupoort, the Dutch ambassador in England.

MY LORD,

In the possession of the right hon. Philip lord Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain. SINCE my last I have received yours, and have since spoken with Mr. Downing; as also having asked him for the letter of the king of Sweden to the parliament, and the rescription made upon it, he declared to me, that he had not yet received a copy of that letter; but he expected an express, which he believed to bring it with him, together with the ratification upon the further agreement of the twenty-fourth of July and fourth of August, which we expect with impatience. That the business of private men of war and piracy is not yet dispatched, is very sad; and, I hope, we shall see a good issue thereof by the next post.

It is certainly to be believed, and I see clearly, that the king of Sweden will continue to refuse, with this consideration, which he proposeth to himself, that he at any time, though business go against him, will obtain the end prescribed by the respective conventions; and if he have the fortune to master Copenhagen, that then the game is his own; so that he by his willingness will be able to gain, and not lose; from whence one may certainly conclude, that the said king, at least in a long time, is not to be brought to reason, unless there be a further mutual agreement made, that in case of a further refusal of the said king, both states shall endeavour to reduce him by arms to the terms of the Bromsebro treaty, without desisting or leaving off, till the same be effected; it being very probable, that so soon as the said king perceives such a resolution, he may chance to change his mind; and in my mind, you will do well to propose to the government there so much: and if it be possible, to get a good resolution effected upon it.

Since that we might certainly gather by the letters from the lords commissioners extraordinary in the Sound, that the peace there, by reason of the refusal of the king of Sweden, would not be effected within the prefixed time. Their noble great lordships have begun to deliberate, what is to be done in eum eventum; and thereupon was resolved, upon saturday last, the inclosed resolution.

Upon the revocation of some ships of both the fleets, many members have judged here, that now the time being come to enter resolutely into action, no lessening or diminution ought to be made; but on the other side there being likewise considered, that the English have great reason in this conjuncture of time and affairs to be desirous to have a good number of ships upon their coasts, is for that consideration especially, and to accommodate them therein, and consequently to cause them to act more resolutely with the other part against Sweden, the day before yesterday was taken the inclosed resolution concerning it, by their noble great lordships, which I hope to get pass to-morrow by the states general; but some provinces have also much to say against it. I perceive by Mr. Downing, that they in England be resolved to pursue the business with vigour against Sweden, in case his majesty continue to refuse to make peace upon the made conventions; having also absolutely declared unto me, that he thought there ought, with all speed, some troops of the duke of Brandenburg to be transported for that end and purpose. I hope God will give a good issue of this business.

Article

Article of a treaty between England and Holland.

IN pursuance and execution of the last clause of the convention made here at the Hague A.D. 1659. the fourth of August last, containing, that the ministers of the three states, at least those of England and the United Provinces being with the kings of Sweden and Denmark, shall advise together, whether it be not convenient to send home a part of the fleet or forces of England and the United Provinces, leaving thereof a sufficient number for the execution of the convention of the twenty-fourth of July last; and the said ministers having thereupon advised together, it was thought good and agreed together, that the ministers of England and the United Provinces, who are with the said kings, shall be authorized, as they are by these presents, to send for England and the United Provinces a part of one and the other fleet; but always with this caution, that there remain sufficient strength for the real execution of the convention of the twenty-fourth of July past, made at the Hague the twelfth of Sept. 1659. [N. S.]

To the right honourable the council of state by authority of the parliament of the commonwealth of England.

THE subscribed ambassador of the lords the states general of the United Netherlands, Vol. lxxv. apprehending, that the adversaries to the re-establishment of the peace in the Sound, P. 555. endeavoured on the behalf of this commonwealth and the state of the United Netherlands, will be much elevated and animated, by reason of the sudden and unexpected withdrawing of the fleet of this commonwealth out of the said Sound, when the time was so near at hand, that the same in pursuance of the said agreement with the said lords the states general, was to be employed jointly with the fleet of the said United Netherlands, to put the said agreement in execution, doth conceive it to be his duty to intreat the council, that the inconveniency, which is like to arise out of the said proceedings of the fleet of this commonwealth, may be in some measure prevented; and offers it therefore to their honours consideration, whether it would not be expedient to dispatch forthwith several ketches to seek or to meet the said fleet with order, that the same should sail in such a bay or place, where a competent number of frigats might speediest be furnished with such victuals and provisions as are wanting and requisite; and the same may be forthwith commanded to return to the Sound aforesaid, to join with such ships of war, as are there on the behalf of the state of the United Netherlands, that so the before-mentioned agreement may be jointly executed, and the free trade and commerce mutually for both states and nations preserved, and their ships protected; and that the proclamation for the preventing of piracies may be published and executed without further delay; and that orders be sent to all vice-admirals and commanders at sea, and in the several ports of this commonwealth, (especially in the Downs and at Dunkirk) to lay an embargo on all the private men of war carrying commission of foreign princes, restoring the ships and goods by them taken from the people and inhabitants of the said United Netherlands.

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Samedy, le 6. Septemb. 1659. [N. S.]

IL y a eu conference, et en a esté fait rapport touchant la vendition des seigneuries de Deurne, Liffet, Bellicom, &c. car le sieur Leefdale s'ayant déclaré de la religion reformée, et ayant beaucoup des témoignages et recommandations des ministres, pretend et supplie, qu'on luy vende les deux premieres à un prix fort civil: en quoy il a divers membres de l'estat, qui le favorisent. Mais autres desirants, que l'estat ne soit pas fraudé de son droit, et du plus haut prix, principalement, puis qu'il y a d'autres, qui sont aussi de la religion reformée, qui offrent notablement d'avantage. Sur cela l'adjudication de la dite seigneurie est encore delayée: et on encline à les vendre toutes à plus offrant, à condition que les acheteurs soyent tous de la religion.

In the possession of the right honourable Philip lord Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain.

Le sieur commissaire Downing a fait nouvelle plainte de quelque caperie favorisée; mais l'on en est mal fatisfait, qu'il ne baille plus ses memoires qu'en Anglois: sur quoy l'agent de Heyde l'a esté voire; qui l'a marqué en François de sa bouche.

En Hollande ceux d'Amsterdam auroient proposés bien 19 points d'accusation contre l'admiral Opdam, desirant qu'il soit rappelé. L'on croit, que Messieurs d'Amsterdam font cela

A.D. 1659. pour tant plus s'excuser envers le petit peuple, qui discourt beaucoup de la non-action ; à fin qu'à Amsterdam et ailleurs on tienne le dit magistrat inculpable de la non-action et de la paix, si elle se fait avec disadvantage.

Lundy, le 8^{me}, dito.

Il y a eu un memoire du sieur ministre d'Espagne touchant une capitaine d'Ostende, que l'admirauté d'Amsterdam, par ordre des estats generaux, a fait arrester à Vlie, pour y avoir mené une prinse Angloise. L'on a mis cela en mains des commissaires.

Il y a eu une lettre de l'evesque de Munster, sans date, pour dehorter cest estat à n'assister pas la ville Munster. Cela est mis en mains des commissaires sur les affaires de Munster.

Il y a eu une petite reclamation d'un navire Danois eschoué quelque part.

Le sieur de Deurne presse toujours son achapt de les seigneuries de Deurne, à l'exclusion du sieur Albada ; sous un presuppost d'admettre à l'achapt des seigneuries seulement les reformées dans la Meyerie. Ce que le roy d'Espagne pretende estre contre le traité de Munster.

Mardy, le 9^{me} dito.

Ceux de l'admirauté, tant de Rotterdam que d'Amsterdam, estant arrivés ici, ont notifié leur arrivement aux estats generaux ; comme de meme les envoyés de Zélé ont requis, qu'on voulusse entrer avec eux en besoigne et conference pour avancer leur expedition. Sur cela est resolu et ordonné, que cest apres-diner se tiendrait une conference.

Ceux de la dite admirauté d'Amsterdam aussy proposent, qu'il sera à-propos de faire revenir ad patriam une bonne partie de la flotte, pour reconduire et convoyer in salvo les navires marchands, qui sont venu de Danfigk, et d'autres, qui ont hyverné à Copenhagen. Pour cest effect propose, qu'au sieur Lt. admiral Obdam soit donné cette charge de reconvoyer ces navires marchandes, et par ce moyen le faire revenir icy.

Mecredy, le 10^{me} dito.

Le roy de Dennemarc par une lettre, et le sieur resident Charisius son resident par un memoire, ont notifié l'indigne rencontre, que le roy de Suede a fait aux deputés de cest estat ; et comment en suite de cela n'est rien à attendre de-là, que de la hostilité ; et pour cela ont representé la necessité de Copenhagen, requerants, qu'elle soit pourveüe de vivres, de ammunitions ; et en outre, que cest estat veuille agir de toute leur force pour defendre sa dite majesté. Cela est mis en mains de commissaires.

La Hollande a produit un advis provincial, qui est en effect une resolution, qu'on doive declarer la guerre de toute la force par la flotte au roy de Suede, ruiner ses navires par tout ou l'on pourra. Les autres provinces se declareront demain sur cela, et indubitablement toutes se conformeront avec la Hollande.

Le sieur Downing a notifiée la victoire, que ceux de parlement ont eu sur les tumultants.

Le sieur le député extraordinaire de Danfigk a eu audience, prenant son congé sur une lettre avocatoire : le sieur president l'a recommenté ; et demain sera avisé sur le present à luy faire.

Le sieur Nieupoort escrit, que le parlement a envoyé nouvel ordre à leurs plenipotentaires, à executer le concert du 29^{me} de Juillet, et 9^{me} d'Aoust : les ministres Suedois ont tasché de faire changer cela, mas en vain. Le parlement a aussy resolu de revictualier quinze navires de la flotte, et rappeler le reste.

Jeudy, le 11^{me} dito.

La Hollande même n'a pas trouvé bon de faire conclurre sur leur serieux advis de hier, conçu contre la Suede ; ains a avisé aujourd'huy, qu'on tasche de conferer sur cela avec les sieurs de Thou et Downing. Item, que tant pour manager et relever l'estat de si grosses depenses, que pour reconduire in salvo une grande quantité de navires marchandes, l'on doive detascher 10 à 12 vaisseaux de guerre de la flotte. Que le Sieur d'Opdam, comme aussy le Sieur Jean Everts, reviendront avec cela icy. La province de Frise a escrit icy, qu'elle a resolu de donner ordre pour le revictuaillement de leurs navires : et pourtant, tant elle que la Groningue ont esté contraire au detaschement et amoindrissement de la flotte ; ains, au contraire, qu'on doive traiter avec l'electeur de Brandenbourg, à fin de transporter de sa cavallerie. Sur quoy est resolu de parler avec le sieur Weyman.

Le Sieur Ripperda a representé, que le roy de Dennemarc a fait prendre ou arrester les enfans et bagage du feu conte de Steynbock (son beau frere) nonobstant que sa majesté, comme aussy les deputés de cest estat, eussent donné passeport aux dits enfans et bagage.

Vendredy,

Vendredy, le 12 me dito.

L'ambassadeur de Thou et le commissaire Downing ont par leurs secrétaires fait requerer une conference sur le sujet de l'avocation de quelques navires des flottes. Le sieur Huygens avec d'autres y sont allés: la Frise et la Groningue n'en ont pas voulu estre, comme estant d'avis de revictualier toute la flotte, consequemment contraire à aucune revocation. L'Overysfel est tout absent.

A.D. 1659.

L'on usera pour rappeler le sieur d'Opdam les propres requisitions, qu'il en a souvent fait, ayant souvent souhaité et demandé sa revocation.

Le sieur Downing a derechef demandé relaxation de la prinse, que celui d'Ostende avoit mené au Vlie, et reparation des dommages: ce qui est mis en mains de commissaires.

Les ministres de son altesse electorale de Brandenburg ont demandé audience, laquelle ils auront demain.

Les officiers de Feuquemont ont fait plainte, que Wouter Vandermeer execute par-cy par-là les inhabitants de ce pais, ayant nouvellement prins les vaches d'un de la religion reformée au pais d'Eisden. Ce qui est mis en mains du conseil d'estat. Ceux de l'admirauté de Zelande ont escrit pour de l'argent.

An intercepted letter of lord Inchiquin.

DEAR CHARGE,

Paris, 13. Sept. 1659. [N. S.]

I HAVE received yours of the twenty-second of August from Falmouth.

Mr. Garner did of late say more to me than formerly, though not much; but now it is all one; for provided I hear of the health of my friends there, I desire to hear nothing else. I am to begin my journey from hence towards Mr. Portman on the seventeenth instant, so as you need not take the pains of writing to me, till I give you notice of my arrival there, where, I hope, I shall not be long before I return; Mr. Kneveton and Mr. Knowls being like to join with Mr. Kirk, to employ me in a business, that may be of good advantage to me.

I SHOULD have some consolation going from hence, if you had made use of the powder, to let me know something, that might have flattered my hopes of Mr. Penn's justice to me, in believing what I profess; and truly, till you say so much to me in his behalf, I shall think him unjust, and myself unhappy. I beg of you more than I should do, to save myself, that you will press him on this point, and let me freely know, what esteem he hath for me, on which more doth depend than perhaps you can imagine. If I knew, that it were his inclination to prefer me before any other, as far as it may be justifiable, I should think myself happier than any other man. Mr. Herbert and Mr. Long

An intercepted letter of lord Inchiquin.

Paris, 14. Sept. 1659. [N. S.]

ON my return hither I found two letters from Mr. Penn, that gave me an account of your health, and the joyful news of England, where I should have been before now, if the air of the hotter countries were not necessary to my health, which I must buy at a dear rate, whilst it separates me from my friends.

In the possession of the right honourable Philip lord high chancellor of Great Britain,

The news from the French court is, that the treaty being ended, (as it will to-morrow) the marshal of Grammond is to go ambassador to Madrid, to demand the princess of Spain; and Don Louis, who accompanies him, hath a proxy from the king of France, to marry her her

A.D. 1659. her in his name. The king of Spain, being well again, is to bring her to the borders, and there to deliver her. The cardinal comes back to the French court by the twenty-second; but our lord embassador stays, as I am told, some days behind him, to pursue a treaty begun between him, and one deputed by Don Louis de Haro. It is observable, that the same day Sir G. Booth was beaten, letters dated at St. Jean de Lux, say, he was totally defeated, and Charles Stuart's hopes overthrown.

There is a noise here of the emperor's sending an army into Alsace against the French; but I do not believe it.

I go hence towards Middleborough within three days. When I am arrived there, I will give you an address to write to me.

Extract out of the register of the resolutions of the states general.

Jovis, 16. Sept. 1659. [N.S.]

Vol. lxx.
P. 579.

AFTER deliberation had, it is resolved, that there shall be blotted out of the register the notes held upon the two memorandums presented to their H. and M. L. by the Heer Charifius upon the twenty-ninth of September, and the second of this month; and the said memorandums shall be restored to the said resident by the secretary Spronsen; or, in case he refuse to receive them, the same shall be suppressed.

To Bordeaux, the French embassador in England.

MY LORD,

Calais, 16. Sept. 1659. [N. S.]

In the possession of the right honourable Philip Id. Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain.

IHAVE received yours, as I was at Montrueil, wherein you write me of the defeat of Sir G. Booth, which I have had since confirmed; and by this means it seems as if all things were quiet again there.

I received yesterday a letter from the cardinal, who writ me word, that he had several conferences, and although they were somewhat long about their business, yet he hoped all would end as was projected; that is to say, as to the peace and marriage; and so we shall rejoice this winter, and in the spring we may chance to be upon some new design. I came only hither to recreate myself. It seems the emperor's army is fallen into Pomerania, which doth belong to the Swedes. I believe this will cause us to look about us; for this is to begin a war, which will fall afterwards on directly against France, by weakening of those allies, and thereby facilitating their design consequently upon Alsace. The marshal of Grammond is to go to make the demand of the infant.

Resolution of the states of Holland the 18th of Sept. 1659. [N. S.]

Vol. lxx.
P. 587.

THERE being debated, whether notwithstanding the advice of the departure of the English fleet out of the Sound, there shall be effected and executed their H. and M. L. resolution, concerning the sending home of some ships of the fleet of this state in the Sound, it is resolved, that notwithstanding the said alteration, the commissioners of this state shall be and remain authorized to licentiate ten ships of the said fleet of this state; but above all, that they take care, that there do remain there a sufficient number for the effecting of the said peace; and furthermore to regulate themselves in all things else according to the resolution of the twelfth instant.

From

From the commissioners in the Sound.

MY LORD,

BY ours of the 24th of August we did give your lordship an account of what proceedings A.D. 1659.
 we had then made in the business you had commanded us. Since that time we have been In the possession of the right hon. Philip lord Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain.
 able to make a very small progress. The king of Denmark did refuse to send his commissioners to the place of treaty, after they had declared, that their king did assent unto all, that was agreed upon at the Hague by the ministers of the three states, unless the king of Sweden would do the like, which he hath refused absolutely to do, or to give any answer unto the project of the treaty, grounded upon the said agreement, and formerly delivered to his commissioners by the ministers of the mediating states. All that was left for us to do was, to persuade the king of Denmark to continue the treaty notwithstanding; and after much solicitation of the Holland ministers, and the servants your lordship employs here, it is at the last resolved, that the treaty shall be renewed, that the rix-hoffmaster be added to the commissioners on the Danish side; and we have this day sent to Fredericshurg to desire a safe conduct for him, and for the Holland ministers, who do not think it fit for them to hazard themselves within the Swedish power without it, now that their fleet acts against them by their orders. We did not at the first find the reason of the Danes unwillingness to renew the treaty; but within a while we discovered it to proceed from the ministers of Austria and Brandenburg; and their friends in the Danish court, who desire to avoid the peace. Whilst the Swede is detained in those hands, they may take from him that, which he holds in Prussia, Pomerania, and Bremen. The Swede might, as we conceive, have found great advantage by assenting to the points agreed at the Hague, stopped the proceedings of the Holland fleet against him, and at leisure might have debated of the time of evacuating of his forces, and other things, which would have gained him much advantage, and possibly have cast the refusal upon the Dane. But he is obstinate in refusing. We do not know in what his confidence lies. His force here is not great, and every day impairs. He is powerfully assaulted by the Muscovite in Livonia, the Polander in Prussia, the emperor and elector of Brandenburg in Pomerania; and we hear, that an army of Austrians, of about 1400 men, is preparing to assault Bremen about the end of this month. The Hollanders employ their whole force against him. A considerable number of Brandenburgish horse will be soon transported hither; and in what he can place any confidence, we cannot tell, unless it be, that he still expects such success, as he had when he came first into this island, when facing this town with about 400 horse and foot, he forced the Dane to the treaty of Roschild, that had 5000 horse, and 20,000 foot within it; or that he thinks still, that though for the necessity of present affairs the parliament did make the agreements at the Hague, to gain time with the Hollanders, yet as soon as the troubles in England were over, that Cromwell's design should be pursued here. And though we do often tell his majesty, and his ministers, that the parliament hath ratified, and will make good their agreements at the Hague, that having given him so fair an opportunity of making peace here upon honourable terms, so as to have leisure to defend himself against the enemies, that assault him in other places, if he neglect that, no more is to be expected from thence; yet he still continues in the same mind, and says often to his servants, that let us say what we will, England and France will never suffer him to fall, but will rather employ their utmost forces to assist him. Perhaps the letter from the parliament will convert him, especially coming after the defeat of the rebels in England. We have sent this day to demand audience of him; but he is so perpetually in motion, that it is hard to find him, and perhaps many days may pass before we obtain it.

The Danes have seized on a place in Schonen called Aftede, with about eight hundred foot. Many of the country come in unto them. It is said the whole province is ready to revolt. The king of Sweden hath sent the marshal Steinbock against them. The place is weak, and may be in danger of being lost, if not speedily relieved. Colonel Killegrew, with about 1000 Holland foot, is commanded thither. He was on saturday night sent with that force to seize upon Koeg, a place about three Dutch miles from this town, fortified by the Swede. But the design was discovered, the enemy prepared, and such a force brought into the place, as made the officers to conclude, it was best to return without attempting any thing; in which they did well, for probably they had been all lost. We say nothing unto your lordships of the fleet, presuming, that long before this time general Montagu hath given your lordship an exact account of all things belonging unto it; and hoping, that if your lordships shall think fit to send back to us such a part as was mentioned in the parliament's order, and your lordships letter, you will give us directions how to employ them. The Holland ministers have now received punctual orders from their superiors, and offer to join what part of their fleet we desire with ours. We do also desire your lordship to consider, how and how long we may in this place be serviceable to your lord-

A.D. 1659. ship and the commonwealth, to let us know your mind, and receive your commands in it, which with all readiness to the utmost of our power shall be exactly observed by,

MY LORD,

Your lordship's most humble,

Copenhagen,
September 12. 1659.

and most obedient servants,

AL. SYDNEY,
ROBERT HONYWOOD,
THO. BOONE.

Since the writing of this letter we hear, that the Danes, who had surpris'd Aftede, upon the approach of marshal Steinbock, did think fit to retire to their ships, which they did without loss. Colonel Killegrew met them at sea, and all together are returned to this town.

Whereas the pursers of the Maidstone and Langport frigots have charged the sums of 120l. sterling and 80l. sterling upon the treasurer of the navy, we desire your lordship's order to the treasurer for the payment of the said bills.

THE under-written resident of the king of Denmark cannot forbear to represent unto your H. and M. L. that by the lords plenipotentiaries and extraordinary commissioners on the behalf of the commonwealth of England, and the United Netherlands, according to the last letters from Copenhagen, he has undertaken to force from his majesty of Denmark, (although he had already declared himself, that they were satisfied with him, and the king of Sweden declared for a refuser) some other prejudicial things, with more than ordinary earnestness, especially, that his majesty would be pleased to proffer his commissioners once more to Sweden, and to resume the treaty, which he had so often and so unworthily rejected. Wherefore the said resident doth desire, that your H. and M. L. will be pleased to consider of the same in their great wisdom, and consequently, deliberante præsertim republica, give order, that his majesty may be freed from such untimely pursuits, at least till such time, that the king of Sweden shall proffer of himself absolutely to accept of the convention made at the Hague, that so their H. and M. L. may fully resolve, what what is to be resolved after such a constitution of affairs to free and rid Denmark fully, and A.D. 1659.

so to obtain the common aim and design on all sides.

A letter of colonel Lillingston and colonel Alsopp to the council of state.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Dunkirk, 14th September, 1659.

IN obedience to your commands, signified by your letter of the 5th instant concerning one Vol. 1xv.
Daniel Walker, now a prisoner here, upon suspicion of bringing in and dispersing false p. 615.
money in this place, and other parts of the country hereabouts, we have herewith sent true copies of the informations and examinations taken in that business, signed by the officer belonging to the civil magistrates of this place, and also sent them some copies of papers found in his house, and of examinations taken before ourselves, the original whereof remain in the custody of the magistrates of the town. And in regard of the miserable condition of the said Daniel Walker, which he is now in through his long imprisonment, and likewise the charge, which will lie on the public, we humbly desire, that some way may be thought of to bring him to a speedy trial here, or in England, as to your honours shall seem most meet. All which is humbly submitted to your grave consideration, and subscribe ourselves,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Your honours ever obedient servants,

HEN. LILLINGSTON,
TOBIAS BRIDGE,
ROG. ALSOPP.

Here is one Ralph Hues, who hath lain under the sentence of death for having a hand in the intended mutiny, against whom we necessitated to proceed with great strictness and security for example. The court-martial did at the same time order the suspension of the execution of the sentence till the coming of the lord Lockhart, or the pleasure of the parliament were known. We find the man very penitent, and cannot discover, that what he did, was premeditated, but done through rashness. We think him a fit object of your mercy; and it is the desire of the officers of this garison at a full meeting, that he may be pardoned, the which we have also signified to the speaker, and do desire your honours furtherance therein.

Mr. Ph. Meadowe to the president of the council of state.

MY LORD,

IHAVE lately received a letter of the 27th of the last moneth from the right honourable Vol. 1xv.
the council of state, signifying their compliance with my desire for my returne home; and p. 617.
that they will take care, that letters of revocation be sent me from the parliament by the first conveniency, I in the mean time to put myself in readines for my coming away. This so seasonable a favour is a renewed engagement upon me, and I shall ever profess myself obliged to all dutiful resentments thereof. I am now in dayly expectation of the said letters of revocation; and to be in forwardnes for my returne, have discharged al my Dutch and outlandish servants, the which and severall other insident expences have necessitated me to draw a bill of this 13th instant upon Mr. Frost, payable at 21 daies to Mr. Thomas Ryder of London for 250 l. sterling. This is the 1st bil I have drawne since the 19th of July; and I hope it will be the last from this place, where, I am sure, I have managed my expences with the utmost frugalitie. As for that money ordered me about 3 weeks since by the commissioners heer by a bil upon Mr. Frost, it was for horses, and other things, which I procured them for their service, which partly were my own proper goods, and partly belonged to others, whom I alsoe satisfyed out of the said moneys ordered to me. I humbly beg of your lordship to move the council to order Mr. Frost to accept and satisfye the said bil of the 13th instant. As for that of the 19th of July, I hope 'tis long ere this satisfyed, albeit Mr. Noel, upon whome it was drawne, made scruples concerning it.

For matters of publick transaction, I humbly crave leave to refer your lordship to the commissioners pacquet, earnestly wishing and expecting to have the opportunitie and honor to

A.D. 1659. to make a more ample representation of the state of things heere by word of mouth, then
 I can by letter ; in the mean time and ever remaining

Your LORDSHIP'S

most humble and most obedient servant,

PH. MEADOWE.

A letter of Nieupoort, the Dutch ambassador in England.

MY LORD,

Vol. lxx.
 p. 643.

THE next day after my last of the 19th I had a conference with the lords Vane, Disbrowe, and Warriston, in which I shewed with all earnestness, that the several piracies are yet daily committed by the inhabitants of this commonwealth against the subjects and inhabitants of the United Netherlands ; and I desired their lordships, that they would at last so order the business, that the intended placart might be agreed, published, and vigorously executed ; and that a certain article, speaking of trading to the East-Indies, inserted by this side, (as being of a quite other nature) might be put out of it, or at least put into such terms, as we were agreed upon the last year in the marine treatise. Their lordships said, that they would report it. I communicated to them the contents of your H. and M. L. resolution on the 10th instant concerning the new impost-money upon foreign ships lading in France ; and I presented to them a translated copy of your H. and M. L. placart published the 20th of August last. Their lordships said, that this nation was also interested therein, and that they would also report it speedily. Afterwards their lordships said, that they had communicated to me the first news of the return of their fleet as fully as they had received it ; and that the council having heard that morning the information of general Montagu, who had informed them, that they had from time to time provisions enough out of the Swedish provinces and islands ; but since it they were agreed with their H. and M. L. commissioners extraordinary, the Swedes would not let them have any thing ; that they had examined what provisions were aboard the fleet, and they found, that there was hardly enough to serve for six weeks ; and that the captains were of opinion, that they ought to have at least a month's provision to make their voyage home, which was not only communicated to the lords plenipotentiaries of this state, but also to their H. and M. L. commissioners extraordinary, with request, that they would consider what number of ships of both sides fleets should be sent home, and what ships remain ; but that their H. and M. L. commissioners extraordinary had declared, that they expected orders about it, and that in the mean time eight days being expired, and that their lordships still said to be without orders, that the said lords plenipotentiaries of this state had thought good to send home the fleet, that the orders sent from hence to the said general to leave 15 ships there, came to his hands, when he was come near to the coast of this state, so that being so near, they had thought good to put all into Solebay, there to expect the end of the parliament. Their lordships declared, that this was the relation of it was made to the council, and that the council was of an opinion, that before the ships could be revictualled and ordered, as they should be, the season of the year would be past : that there were other reasons, why the council conceived, that the ships of this state ought to be kept in these seas : that yet however it was in no wise the intention of this state to abandon and go from what was agreed between the two states concerning the accommodating of the two northern kings ; but that with the good liking of their H. and M. L. the business might be so ordered, that the same might be wholly left in the Netherland fleet. I answered their lordships to this, that I had not yet received any order about this subject ; but that I could not forbear to acquaint them with my apprehension, that the same would occasion a great hindrance in the business of the peace, and also cause some jealousy to be taken by it : that England having sent a fleet in December last to the Sound, should now make difficulties to send the same thither, or at least a part of it, if need be : that they had always said, that the best way to effect the peace would be upon the account of the fleets of both sides : that it was to be imputed to the government, that the former season was expired so fruitless, and that now the time was come to make use of the fleet, that they were so suddenly departed. So that I conceived, that it was necessary, without delay, to send away the ready ship, and faithfully perform what had been agreed upon in the Hague, and approved and ratified by the government here. Their lordships assured me, that they had proceeded with all faithfulness since the restoring of the present government, and that they would not go from what was mutually agreed ; but that they might accommodate one another in the manner and circumstances ; and after several discourses concerning the affairs in the Sound, their their lordships said, they would make report, and then speak further with me about it. I have received their H. and M. L. resolutions of the 12th and 17th; and have communicated the contents thereof to the council by word of mouth, and in writing; and earnestly desired, that a speedy, fruitful, and final resolution, might be taken upon them, which they promised should be done without loss of time; and this morning they sent me the inclosed resolution taken in the parliament upon the said report of the council; and the lord Warriston hath assured me, that the commissioners will come to me to-morrow to conclude the article concerning the preventing of piracies.

W. NIEUPOORT.

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Samedy, le 20 Septemb. 1659. [N. S.]

IL y a eu un avis de l'admirauté d'Amsterdam sur la dispute, que le ministre d'Espagne a avec le Sieur commissaire d'Angleterre touchant la prise que tel Ostendois avoit fait, ayant composé avec le propriétaire. L'avis est, que tant les uns que les autres traitent mal les navires de cest estat, tant en Biscaye & ailleurs qu'en Angleterre. Si que cest, in-tertior sum multo quam ante.

Ceux de Hollande ont importé diverses résolutions provinciales. Celle que le Sieur Vander Honard doit subsister encore, et ne revenir pas seule, est arrêtée. Les autres sont mis es mains de commissaires. Touchant ces 10 points n'est encore rien finalement résolu.

Lundy, 22. dito.

Le Sieur Downing a derechef fait présenter un mémoire touchant la prise, ou navire prise par le caper d'Ostende. Un des estats généraux auroit dit, il faudra donner quelque contentement à cest homme; autrement il nous causera du mal.

Du roy de Dennemarc a esté une lettre derechef, et du Sieur Charisius un mémoire, exhortant et sommant pour secours, et spécialement que pour le present et par provision il faut 300,000 ryxdalers.

A l'instance de Hollande on a résolu au retour du lieutenant admiral Opdam avec 20 navires.

Aussy est résolu, que le chef de la flotte obeira aux ordres des députés de cest estat au Sondt.

L'on n'a rien encore résolu touchant les nécessités de Copenhagen. Et quant au principal, on attend ce qui viendra d'Angleterre pour renvoyer une flotte vers le Sondt. Sans cela on condamne l'Angleterre non servata fidei, comme l'on a desja écrit au Sieur Nieupoort de représenter.

Mardy, le 23. dito.

Du Sieur Downing il y a derechef un mémoire, complaignant de ce qu'on ne restitue point le navire Anne Marie; mais d'autant qu'on attend aussy les avis des autres admirautés, il faudra attendre la venue de ces avis.

Le Sieur president a rapporté à l'assemblée, que le ministre d'Espagne luy a communiqué par discours, que maintenant le mariage aussy bien que la paix avec la France estoit ajusté, et pleinement conclu et assuré.

Il y a eu une lettre de la ville d'Emden, estant un remerciement et ensemble une tacite protestation, qu'elle n'esperoit pas, que cest estat voudroit à elle disputer le droit de se choisir un commendeur.

Hier il n'y a eu qu'une lettre du Sieur Vogelsanck seul signé, contenant que les députés Anglois avoient encore eu une conférence avec les commissaires de Suede, qui persistoient toujours, que le roy de Suede ne commettrait jamais cette lascheté, que d'accepter un traité fait par des tuteurs.

Mecredy, le 24. dito.

Les amis de Leefdale et de Tienen travaillent encore à ce qu'à eux seront rendues les seigneuries de Deurne et Bellicom à civil prix pour les considérations, qu'on fait. La Frise et l'Overyssel l'ont derechef aujourd'huy empêché.

En Orange l'on voit, que le roy de France assiste la princesse royale contre le conte de Dona gouverneur.

Le principal revenue du prince est un certain péage sur le Rohne, qui se leve ou paye en un endroit, qui n'est pas de la juridiction d'Orange, ains du roy, qui a estably tel homme, que la princesse royale y a mis pour la reception. Ce qui est oster au conte de Dona le principal moyen de sa subsistence.

A.D. 1659.

Le roy aussy aura escrit au conte de Dona de ne vouloir pas contrarier la princeſſe royale. Du Sieur Charifius il y a eu derechef un memoire contenant plainte de ce, que non ſeulement les miniſtres de France et d'Angleterre, mais aussy ceux de ceſt eſtat preſſent ſa maieſte de Dennemarc à rentrer en traité avec le roy de Sucde, prétendant qu'on ne devoit plus parler de traiter ; ains faire la guerre à tout outrance.

Ceux de Hollande ont propoſé derechef un grand concept, ſelon lequel l'on devoit ſecourir et pourvoir à Copenhagen ; mais ne le propoſant que de bouche, on l'a requis en eſcrit.

Jeudy, le 25. dito.

Aujourd'huy en preſence de la Hollande et du conſeil d'eſtat derechef eſt fait une concepte reſolution pour trouver les deniers neceſſaires à pourvoir la ville de Copenhagen de ce qui faut pour la conſerver. En quoi, ſera faite diſtinction entre la garniſon ou troupes de ceſt eſtat et les vivres. Pour les troupes ſeront negotiés 300,000 l. Le reſte ſeraourny d'autre façon. Tant y a qu'il faut de l'argent ; et pour mieux fournir tout, l'on convoque derechef les admirautés pour d'aujourd'huy à huit jours.

Il y a eu un memoire derechef du Sieur Downing encore reclamant le navire Anne Marie avec menaces, comme aussy il aura parlé en menaçant au Clerc Verhaer, qui a eſté luy parler là-deſſus.

Le Sieur Downing plaint aussy, qu'à Amſterdam s'equippe aussy un navire par les Bickers, qui paſſeroient au ſervice de l'Eſpagne. Sur quoy eſt reſolu, que caution ſera conſtituée, que le navire n'ira point en ſervice de l'Eſpagne.

Un placart ſera publié, contenant prohibition à toutes navires de ne naviguer point ſur havres ou places, qui ſont ſous la Suede.

Vendredy, le 26. dito.

Ce matin on a achevé de conclurre touchant la proviſion à envoyer vers Copenhagen ; et les provinces ſont tombées d'accord environ ſur les points cy-devant mentionnés. Enſemblement eſt reſolu, qu'on aura ſoin de bien pourvoir aux frontieres de vers l'Allemagne, eſtant aussy ſur ce propos parlé de Munſter, comme place, qui couvre les provinces de Geldre, Overyſſel, Friſe & Groninguen, eſtant mis es mains des deputés pour examiner les memoires ſur ce exhibés.

Item, aussy eſt mis ſur le tapis l'affaire de S. A. E. de Brandenbourg, pour traiter plus eſtroitement et ſpecialement à paſſer de ſes troupes en Dennemarc ; ſur quoy ſont ordonnées des commiſſaires.

Le Sieur Nieupoort a eſcrit de l'arrivement du lord Montagu, mais froidement, au lieu qu'on attendoit, que le dit Montagu ſeroit mis dans le Tour pour eſtre revenu ſans ordre.

Extract out of the ſecret reſolutions of the H. and M. L. ſtates general of the United Netherlands.

Veneris, the 26th Sept. 1659. [N. S.]Vol. lxxv.
p. 659.

WAS produced and read to the aſſembly the written report of the lords Huygens and others their H. and M. L. commiſſioners for the affairs of Sweden and Denmark, according to their reſolution of the 10th inſtant. Whereupon being debated, it was afterwards reſolved as followeth :

Fiſt, That the council of ſtate, being fiſt informed of all the wants in the city of Copenhagen, do take care to ſend thither under a ſufficient convoy of ſhips of war a magazine of all manner of proviſions for the ſuſtenance of ſix thouſand men effectual for the ſpace of 8 months ; alſo ſome ſtore of cloaths, ſhoes and ſtockings ; as alſo of match and other ammunition.

Secondly, That in the mean time the ſaid magazine is providing, care be taken for a further proviſion of neceſſaries of all ſorts for the ſaid city upon the advice and information of the lord Charifius, as without any loſs of time can be got together ; and that the council of ſtate do take an account of what will be required for the ſame for the ſpace of 8 months, which being ſhewn and ſeen by their H. and M. L. they will give credit to their extraordinary commiſſioners to provide the ſame in the towns upon the eaſt ſea, and the near adjacent places, where the ſame be moſt conveniently to be bought, beſides the magazine, which is to be ſent from hence.

Thirdly, That the ſaid lords commiſſioners extraordinary having fiſt informed themſelves fully with the greateſt certainty about the condition and quantity of proviſions, ammunition, medicaments, and other neceſſaries, which are or will be ſhortly in the ſaid city of Copenhagen for this next winter, and having alſo taken an exact account, as near as it is poſſible, of what will be wanting, they ſhall ſeriouſly admoniſh the king and his council to make good ſuch defect themſelves.

Fourthly,

Fourthly, The said lords commissioners extraordinary shall be informed from hence of ^{A.D. 1659.} the provision and quantities of provisions, cloaths, and ammunition, bought by the council of state to serve for their formation.

Fifthly, Great care shall be taken to free the city of Copenhagen from that great inconvenience through want of firing, as wood and other combustibles; and to that end the king of Denmark shall be earnestly desired to make provision against it, by sending for wood from . . . or elsewhere, for which end he shall have permission to send a convoy of the ships of war of this state. And withal it is resolved, that the lord ambassador Nieupoort do insist to this parliament to send over hither a good quantity of coals under a sufficient convoy, as much as will serve for the space of 3 months.

Sixthly, That without loss of time by the said lords Huygens and other their H. and M. L. commissioners, together and with the consent of the commissioners of England, there shall be understood of the present commissioners of the duke of Brandenburg, whether and what sufficient number of horse and foot will be transported with the good liking of the duke, and what means there is at hand for doing of the same, or further required, and where it is best to be done, and speedily supplied.

Seventhly, That there be also seriously insisted by the lord ambassador Nieupoort, that the parliament of England be disposed to send over a good quantity of long and short boats to Copenhagen.

Eighthly, That since your H. and M. L. for many reasons do very much apprehend what is proposed by the lord Charisius concerning the want of money, that they are willing in some wise to supply the same by provision; and in the mean time the lords commissioners shall know of the lord Charisius here, what good conditions his majesty will give for disburfing of the same.

Ninthly and lastly, That for the speedy raising of moneys necessary for the buying of the said provisions, the said council of state is hereby ordered and desired to negotiate at the charge of this state without any loss of time for the sum of three hundred thousand guilders to pay for the said necessities and provisions for the space of 8 months, required for the maintaining of the militia of this state in Denmark: and moreover, that all the provinces shall be desired to pay at the farthest within 3 weeks after the date hereof, into the treasury of the receiver general Doublett here at the Hague, their respective shares in the sum of 800,000 guilders, required for the furnishing of the said city of Copenhagen with all necessities, which cannot suffer any delay, nor must not, if so be men will not let the business come to the utmost extremity in those parts; and their H. and M. L. do desire the lords Huygens and other their H. and M. L. commissioners for the affairs of Sweden and Denmark to confer with the council of state about the speedy executing of these their H. and M. L. resolutions without any delay, or loss of time.

At the council of state at Whitehall, Wednesday, Sept. 21. 1659.

UPON reading a letter from colonel Lillingston, colonel Bridges, and colonel Alsopp, ^{Vol. lxx.} from Dunkirk of the 14th instant, ordered, that the said letter and papers inclosed, ^{p. 667.} touching one Walker, be referred to the committee for the affairs of Dunkirk to consider thereof, and report their opinion therein to the council.

WM. ROBINSON, clerk of the council.

Colonel Lillingston, colonel Alsopp, and colonel Bridge, to the council of state.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Dunkirk, 22. Sept. 1659.

WE did in our letter sent by lieutenant-colonel Kingwell give your honours an account ^{Vol. lxx.} of the state of your affairs in this place, and did then acquaint you, how the case ^{p. 669.} stood with us in reference to money, the remaining part of our whole stock being to be paid out this day to the soldiers for the next week's subsistence; and in case a supply should not come to us by the latter end of the next week, we shall be in a very sad condition, the customs (which have been very considerable of late) being engaged to the citizens for money by us borrowed of them, as we have formerly acquainted you. Very much money hath been expended in the fortifying this town and fort Oliver, and it is now (God be thanked!) made very tenable; and it would be no small trouble to us to see, that through want of timely supplies any occasion should be given to the soldiery, which might produce any distemper by way of mutiny, or otherwise for want of a livelihood, so as to have this garison snatched out of your hands, which hath cost so much English blood, and the nation's treasure. We doubt not of your care of us, only we conceive it our duty to mind

A.D. 1659. mind you hereof. We being very sensible of the multiplicity of business, which lies on your hands in relation to the management of the weighty affairs of the three nations, we forbear to trouble your honours with the particulars of our present wants, having several times informed you thereof by letters and otherwise, and lately by lieutenant-colonel Kingwell, which we humbly beg may be speedily taken into your serious consideration, that nothing here may fall out contrary to your expectation, and our desires, as to the safety and security of this place, for want of timely supplies, which we shall endeavour, through the assistance of God, to prevent to the utmost of our power, and always approve ourselves to be,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Your honours very faithful and obedient servants,

HEN. LILLINGSTON,
ROG. ALSOPP.
TOBIAS BRIDGE,

The substance of the intelligence received 27. Sept. 1659.

Hague, ^{3. Octob.}_{23. Sept.} 1659.

Vol. lxx.
p. 671.

THE English fleet being departed upon a sudden from the Sound, they here intend a vigorous prosecution of the war against Sweden. However, the treaty goes on between the two kings by commissioners on both sides, in the presence of the French, English, and Dutch mediators; but the king of Denmark will not be persuaded, that the negotiation at Roschild should be resumed or finished, as the Dutch plenipotentiaries write in their letter to their superiors of the $\frac{12}{22}$. September, 1659. complaining also of the king's refractoriness, saying, that although they were assured by the king himself, that the declaration he was to make about this treaty should be such, that he might rest satisfied with it, that yet when they came to read it, they found themselves abused therein, being of the same tenor with the former. Upon which (they say) that the next morning, at an audience, they endeavoured with all imaginable arguments to persuade the king to lay aside all scruples; and that both they and the English plenipotentiaries have given him assurance, that during the treaty and peace shall be concluded to the content of the three states, the fleet and land-forces shall continue in vigorous action, according to the agreement in the Hague. All they obtained upon this conference was, that the rix-hoffmaster should be added to the two other commissioners of the Dane, to meet upon the treaty in the place agreed upon between Copenhagen and the Swedish leaguer, in tents set up to that purpose. And of this the English plenipotentiaries undertook to give notice to the Swedish commissioners, and to procure passes, as well for the rix-hoffmaster as for them. That was the substance of their letter, more than that they acquaint the states, that they had ordered one of the ships of war to passport to the Hague Monsr. Coyet, whom the Swede was sending as ambassador to the states. By this and other papers you will see, that the king of Denmark is for the war, and not for the peace upon the terms propounded, and therefore hardly drawn to continue the treaty, and pressing very hard for a vigorous prosecution of the war; and to this end his resident Charisius at the Hague hath put in a memorandum to the states, as followeth:

High and mighty lords, Although the under-written resident of his majesty of Denmark and Norway did believe, that your H. and M. L. would have been pleased to have made such reflection upon his memorandum of the 24th and 29th of the last month, as the present constitution of affairs and the common interest were requiring, that such order would have been given to the commissioners in Denmark, that their lordships would have superseded all further unjust pursuits, which they make to the king to engage him, against all reason and equity, in a form of a treaty with the king of Sweden, helping the enemy thereof to gain more time, to the ruin of the king of Denmark; he understands, to his great grief and sorrow, that his majesty of Denmark hath yet that misfortune, that by some few (not knowing for what reason) against the good intention of the state, and the judgment of most in the government, the great cost and charge, which hath been laid out about the fleet and otherwise, is lost, the season of the year will be spent, and the Swedish minister, who is expected here, will be arrived, who, through cunning devices and practices, will endeavour to prevent this great work, which, through God's blessing, is only to be effected by your H. and M. L. What friendship can this state expect from the the Swede, his perfidious hard usage towards their ministers can sufficiently satisfy; and A.D. 1659, now at last to nourish serpentem in sinu, by bringing over the Swedish minister, is very admirable. But the said resident hopes their H. and M. L. will be no longer deluded, but powerfully endeavour, that a general peace may be made, and that the three dominions upon the East sea may be left to every body, the Northern crowns balanced, the free commerce of the East sea maintained, and that the king of Denmark may enjoy the contents of the Bromsbroo treaty. Given at the Hague, the ^{2d Octob.} 1659, _{22d Sept.}

Before this paper came in, the states had resolved on a vigorous prosecution of this business; and upon a report made to them by the lords Huygens and others their commissioners for the affairs of Sweden and Denmark, they agreed the points following:

1. That the council of state do send to Copenhagen, under a good convoy, a magazine of all manner of provisions, for the sustenance of 6000 men for eight months, as also store of cloaths, shoes and stockings, as also of match and other ammunition.

2. That until the magazine can be furnished, necessaries of all sorts, by advice with Monf. Charisius, be provided in the towns upon the East sea by the lords commissioners of the state in the Sound.

3. That the commissioners extraordinary do admonish the king of Denmark to use his utmost power to furnish Copenhagen with such provisions of all sorts as are necessary.

4. That the commissioners extraordinary be informed from hence of the provision, cloaths, and ammunition brought here by the council of state.

5. That store of firing be provided out of Norway by the king of Denmark, and some of the ships of war of this state be permitted to go thither in the country; and that the ambassador Nieuport do insist with the parliament of England to send to Copenhagen a good quantity of coals, with a convoy, as may serve for eight months.

6. That the lord Huygens, and others of their H. and M. L. commissioners, together with the English commissioners, do inform themselves of the present commissioners of the duke of Brandenburg, what sufficient number of horse and foot will be transported into the Denmark island, and what means there are in hand for the doing the same, and further required, and where it is best to be done.

7. That the ambassador Nieuport do insist with the parliament to send over a good quantity of long and short boats to Copenhagen.

8. That they are sensible of what is proposed by Monf. Charisius touching the want of money; that they are willing in some sort to furnish the same: and in the mean time Charisius is to be spoken with, to know from him, what good conditions his majesty of Denmark will give for disbursing the same.

That the council of state, for making the said provision, is to endeavour to raise 300,000 guilders.

These resolutions being communicated to Monf. Charisius, he exhibited the following paper:

H. and M. lords, In regard the under-written resident of his majesty of Denmark hath understood, by the generous resolutions of the 26th Sept. not without great delight, their gallant and vigorous intention and care, not only of victualling Copenhagen for this next winter, but also to furnish it with firing and other necessaries, and is further informed, that there is a fleet going to Norway, he could not omit proposing to your H. and M. L. that letters may be written to your commissioners extraordinary in the Sound, and to those who have the chief command of your fleet, that they send two or three ships of war to Norway, authorizing them to press such merchant-men as are there, to bring each of them a ship lading of wood to Copenhagen, paying them freight. Hague, ^{3. Octob.} 1659, _{23. Sept.}

And whilst these things are doing here, the commissioners extraordinary are employing the fleet and forces in Denmark against Sweden, as is certified in the letter of the said commissioners of the $\frac{1}{2}$ Sept. 59. who write, that they had formerly given an account what had been done by them for the effecting of their H. and M. L. intentions, as well before the expiration of the 15 days as since, and are now expecting the arrival of lieutenant-admiral Opdam with the whole fleet, wishing that he come further, and upon the departure of the English fleet, as they desire him. That in the mean time the vice-admiral, with 18 ships, hath an eye to the Swedish ships in the harbour of Langport, either to fight them, if they venture forth, or to ruin them in the harbour, if it be possible. As also they hinder the correspondence between Schonen and Zeland, and are also to alarm the king of Sweden, as often as opportunity shall serve. That a few days since it was thought good to attempt the taking of Kinck, and colonel Killigrew was put upon it, to be assisted and favoured by your commander Evertson with his ships; but the Swedes got notice of it, and put the place into a good defence; and Killigrew was countermanded, and is ordered to go towards Ustede in Schonen; which place is possessed by some Danish troops sent from Copenhagen, and at present defends itself against Sweden, and it is hoped they will defend it, until the arrival of Killigrew.

A.D. 1659. The states general have also written to the admiralties to take and bring in all Swedish ships, that can be met withal, and have also prohibited the going out of their ships into the Swedish harbours.

So that things are, in a manner, come to extremity between the Swede and the Dutch. And it is here also taken ill, that your fleet returned from the Sound as it did. Nieupoort writes to them by his letter of the $\frac{16}{26}$. Sept. 59. that Sir H. Vane, general Desbrowe, and Warrifton, in a conference with him, told him, that the council had communicated to him the first news of the arrival of their fleet; that since they had received the information of general Montagu by word of mouth, who informed them, that formerly they had received store of provisions out of the Swedish provinces; but since they were agreed with their H. and M. L. the Swedes would not let them have any thing. That they had examined what provisions they had aboard their fleet, and found, that there was hardly enough for six weeks; and that the captains were of opinion, that they ought to have a month's provision to enable them to make their voyage home. That this was communicated to the lords plenipotentiaries of England, but to the extraordinary commissioners or the states general, with request, that they would consider what number of ships of both fleets should be sent home, and what to remain. That their H. and M. L. commissioners answered, that they had received no order about it as yet, and that after eight days being expired, and that their lordships still said they had no orders. That the lords plenipotentiaries of this state had thought good to send home the fleet. That the order sent from hence to the said general to leave fifteen ships, came to his hands, when he was come near to the coast of this state; so that being so near, they had put all into Southwold bay, there to expect the orders of the parliament. That now the council was of an opinion, that before the ships could be victualled, the season of the year would be past. That besides there were other reasons, why the council conceived, that the ships of this state ought to be kept in these seas. That yet it was not in any-ways the intention of this state to abandon and go from what was agreed between the two states for accommodating the differences between the two Northern kings; but that the business might be left wholly to the Netherland fleet. To this Nieupoort answered, that he had not yet received any order upon this subject; but yet that he could not forbear to acquaint them with his apprehension, which was, that this would occasion a great hindrance in the peace, as also cause some sea business between these two states. That England could send a fleet in December last to the Sound, and should now make difficulty to send one thither in October. That the council of state had always said, that the best way to effect the peace was by the fleets on both sides. That it was to be imputed to the government, that the summer-season was expired so fruitlessly, and that now the time was come to make use of the fleet, that they were so suddenly departed; so that he conceived it was necessary, without delay, to send away the ready ships, and faithfully perform what had been agreed upon in the Hague, and approved and ratified by the government here. That Sir H. Vane and the rest answered, that this state had proceeded with all faithfulness since the restoring of the present government; and that they would not go from what was mutually agreed, but that they might accommodate one another in the manner and circumstances. This general answer gives us satisfaction here; and Mons. de Witt hath declared as much in his letters to Mons. Nieupoort, wherein speaking of the sending a person in the quality of ambassador to the Hague, he saith, he looks upon it as very necessary to be done; but yet wisheth, that the spirits and minds of their government, which are very much discomposed, as well by the English abandoning of affairs in the Sound, through the sudden and ungrounded departure of their fleet, as also through the continual depredations at sea, were first pacified, by redressing of the first with some public demonstration, and by concluding of the project against depredations. He writes also further, that he expected to receive, by the last post, the resolution of the parliament upon Nieupoort's complaint about coming home of the English fleet; and that in case this business be delayed, and that no reparation and satisfaction follow upon such a notorious contravention of the agreement of the 24th July, he much doubted of the good intentions of that side, and expected no good from thence; adding further, that the lords there ought to consider, that the fleets of this state have lain fruitless in the Sound all this summer, only to enjoy the more fruit, through the co-operation of England; and that that fruit being at present disappointed, there is occasioned a general indignation amongst the inhabitants here against those, who endeavoured to bring the business to a firm agreement with England; and they also will be taught hereby, not to act at another time with so much confidence in a business, which concerns the commonwealth of England; and what will follow at last from hence, those in the government of England may well consider. He further saith, that the excesses of the pirates grow greater daily, whereby the minds and dispositions of the government here are so insolent, that he dares not as yet so much as propound the great work of the alliance.

And

And they here are not more dissatisfied with the proceedings of England in this business A.D. 1659. of the Sound, than France is with the last agreement of the Hague, that of the 24th July, and 4th of August. The French ambassador, Monsi. de Thou, refused to sign it at that time, in respect it was agreed to force both the kings by armies, tho' he readily agreed to that of the 21st of May. And Monsi. Boreel, the states ambassador at Paris, hath laboured to dispose the French king to agree with England and the Low Countries; but cannot obtain any answer to his desire, as he writes by his letter of the $\frac{16}{20}$. Sept. 1659. And the truth is, Monsi. de Thou did often represent the inconveniency of this last agreement, and declared, that France would not agree to a constraint; and doth now express himself, that if the treaty of Roschild had been stuck to and executed, as it is agreed in that treaty of the 21st of May, the present difficulties would have been prevented, and the business at an end ere now.

By letters from Dantzick of the $\frac{10}{20}$. Sept. it is certified, that the lord John Van Honaert, extraordinary commissioner of the states, arrived there, as also the Swedish and French ambassadors, to begin the treaty between the Pole and the Swede. In the mean time the Pole is preparing to assault the places held by the Swede in Prussia.

This government is labouring all they can to provide victuals for their fleet; and the states of Holland have consented to the sum of 690,000 guilders desired by the council of state for that purpose.

It is more and more evident, that there is a very strict alliance between the elector of Brandenburg and the emperor; for those of Brandenburg did, in a conference, recommend the emperor to the states, and persuade by all reasons imaginable, that the states general will hold the emperor for their friend, and consequently treat with him, representing, that he will not give his troops to be transported to Denmark, but by an alliance with the states, obliging them reciprocally. The commissioners extraordinary in the Sound have power to order part of the fleet to lie before Wymar and Stralsound, to hinder the Swedes from transporting the men out of the isles of Denmark into Pomerania.

And they have had a conference with your commissioner Downing, touching the design of transporting the Brandenburg troops into Denmark, who excused it for want of power; and being desired to agree somewhat in it provisionally with respect to the future approbation of the parliament, he put them in mind, that this state had taken very ill, that the lord Nieupoort had agreed to the prolongation for three weeks on the cessation in the Sound, under future approbation.

There is come hither to the assembly at Holland, a letter, containing, that they ought to call home Opdam, and to make him answer to his accusations; as also, that the estate of kings is fluctuating, and that the state had need of an illustrious head.

There have been several conferences with the agent of Brandenburg, touching the transporting of the cavaliers. The conditions, which he offers, are as follow:

1. Imperatorem sibi amicum noverint.
2. Respondeatur ad propositionem antebac factam.
3. De securitate electoris statuant.
4. Naves portorias procurent.
5. Commeatum promoveant.
6. Deputati desistant cogere regem Daniæ.
7. Legatum hostis ne admittant.
8. Impediant, quantum fieri possit, transitum inter Serviam & Pomeraniam.
9. Legato suo in Polonia mandent agere pro præsentè rerum statu.
10. Correspondentiam in Polonia cum electoratibus teneant, item pro religione ibidem agant.
11. Amicitiam episcopi Monasteriensis ne negligant.

De Witt to Nieupoort, the Dutch ambassador in England.

MY LORD,

Hague, 3d of Octob. 1659. [N. S.]

UPON the 26th of the last month, I advertised you of the reception of your letter of Vol. lxx. the 19th of the same month. Since I have received yours of the 26th; and I hope P. 685. you have at last brought to a conclusion the convention about the business of piracy, in regard the excesses grow daily greater, and more intolerable; also the minds and dispositions of the governors here are thereby so much alienated, that as yet I have not thought it convenient to advance the great work of an alliance. In the mean time your lordship will see by the inclosed resolution of their noble great lordships, that we do not yet fail to cause to be restored any English prizes, that are brought in here, notwithstanding the contrary opinion of the admiralty, and without taking any notice of a formal contract made for

A.D. 1659. for a ransom between the skipper and the taker; so that we hope no notice will be taken of the like contract made to the prejudice of the inhabitants of this state.

I expect, that your lordship will have prevailed to have put out of the project delivered to you, the article speaking of the East-Indies, which in truth is inserted in the same très-mal-à-propos, and will not be admitted of here; and that you will have redress, and clear up all dark or ambiguous periods of the said project; and that you have concluded and signed the same, according to their H. and M. L. resolution, that neither state shall give leave to their subjects to take commissions of foreign potentates, to each others prejudice; which though this cannot be well inserted in the publication, which is to be made, yet it must be done in the convention itself, or in an act by itself.

That a considerable member of the government there should come over thither, I look upon it as very necessary; but I wish, that the spirits and minds of our government here, which are very much discomposed, as well by abandoning of affairs in the Sound, through the sudden and ungrounded departure of the English fleet, as also through the continual depredations at sea, were first pacified, by redressing of the first with some public demonstration, and by concluding of the said project, and the vigorous execution of the same upon the second; that so with more confidence the negotiation of the said honourable person, that is to be sent hither, might be effected and brought to a good end.

We expected to have received by the last post the resolution of the parliament upon your complaint about the coming home of the English fleet, made in pursuance of their H. and M. L. letter; and in case this business be delayed, and that no reparation and satisfaction follow upon such a notorious contravention of the agreement of the 24th of July, I must roundly confess, that I must doubt of the good intention of that side, and expect no good from thence. The lords there ought to consider, that the fleet of this state have lain fruitless in the Sound all this summer, only to enjoy the more fruit thereby through the co-operation of England; and that the fruit being at present disappointed, thereby is occasioned a general indignation of all the inhabitants here against those, who, with the said respect for the good of this state, did endeavour to bring the business to a firm contract with England; and that they thereby will also teach such governors, not to act at another time in a business with so much confidence, which hath any regard to the commonwealth of England; and what will at last follow from thence, those of the government in England may well consider. You may safely give a contravist to the ambassador of Portugal, and continue with him in discourse in the terms mentioned in your letter, although I find the inclinations of Holland to be such, that they will not finally persist upon restitution of lands there.

Vol. lxvi.
P. 5.

THE lords commissioners of the province of Zeland have once more urged in pursuance of their proposition of the third instant, to the end that leave may be given to the lord de Hubert, one of the commissioners extraordinary of this state in Denmark, to return home. Whereupon being debated, it is resolved herewith to consent to the said request; and consequently a letter shall be writ to the said lord Hubert, that he may return home, whensoever his occasions shall not permit to stay any longer there, if so be the same can be done without prejudice to the treaty of peace.

Vol. lxvi.
P. 11.

THERE being again produced to the assembly the letters of the lord ambassador Nieupoort of the third instant, with inclosed papers relating thereupon; whereupon being debated, it is resolved, that there shall be writ to the said ambassador, that he do signify to those of the government there, that their H. and M. L. did not understand without considerable admiration, that the negotiation about the business of private men of war, and against the bringing in of ships into each other's harbour, was not yet perfected; whereas the said raging evil did increase daily more and more; with order, that he the said lord ambassador shall yet use all manner of earnestness and diligence, to the end the said negotiation may be yet brought to a good conclusion, conformable to the foregoing their H. and M. L. resolution of the 23d of July, the 8th of August, and the 3d of September last respectively; at least that their H. and M. lordships may know, what the final meaning and intention of

of the government there is about it. Moreover, the said lord ambassador is withal power-^{A.D. 1659.} fully to confute the exceptions proposed unto him for the departure of the English fleet out of the Sound, being taken out of the verbal relation of the lord Montagu, and read unto him; and especially that which doth seem to tend thereunto, as if by the lords commissioners extraordinary of this state with the kings of Sweden and Denmark, directly or indirectly something had been committed, or omitted and refused, contrary to the true intent and contents of the conventions of the 21st of May, the 24th of July, and the 4th of August last; and that by such reasons and arguments, as the said lord ambassador shall be able to apply in defence of the right of this state, and which he shall judge to be of most power, force, operation, and persuation. Likewise he the said lord ambassador shall signify to those of government there, that their H. and M. lordships, after examination of the answer of the said parliament of the 22d of Sept. stylo loci, have observed with sorrow, that the said parliament, in lieu of proceeding to a real execution of the said convention, by effecting of the points in their H. and M. lordships resolutions of the 12th and 17th of the last month particularly expressed, according to the obligation introduced by the said conventions, and whereunto consequently there needs no new treaty, that state seems to continue with a general declaration to be ready to make such further treaties, and to take such resolutions, and make articles with their H. and M. lordships, as whereby will be demonstrated their sincerity in all the said conventions; and that the said lord ambassador shall in the name and behalf of their H. and M. lordships yet summon those of the said government to the sincere observation of the said conventions, not with words, but with deeds; and especially, that he do obtain, that the said parliament, in performance of the fourth article of the treaty of the said 21st of May last, by a publication demonstrative do recall out of the service of the king of Sweden all English, Scots, and Irish regiments; likewise all officers, soldiers and mariners of that nation, which are yet in the service of the said king. Likewise, that the parliament, for the making good of the convention of the 24th of July last, which followed upon the said treaty, do help to compel the king of Sweden with all their power, to accept of the peace, and unto the end that they do send back a sufficient fleet to the Sound; also that by provision they do give express orders to all their admirals, vice-admirals, commanders, and captains at sea, as also all their governors, or other officers of their ports under their command, to take and seize upon all Swedish ships of war, or merchant-men, wheresoever they can meet them, and to bring them into their harbours, and there detain them, as their H. and M. lordships have already given the necessary orders on their side, that the said parliament do also give due authority to their commission Downing here, together with commissioners of this state, to agree with the minister of the duke of Brandenburg here, about the transporting of the Brandenburg forces, and about all that can be contributed by the duke of Brandenburg, with vigour and prejudice against the king of Sweden; as also about what may be reciprocally desired in the behalf of the said duke, for his security and equity: that the said parliament also in specie may contribute what lieth in them to help furnish the city of Copenhagen with provision, and especially with firing; and that the said lord Nieupoort shall desire a speedy and special answer upon all the above-said, of the parliament, to the end their H. and M. lordships may know upon what they have to declare concerning the same. And he the said lord ambassador shall also declare to the parliament, that their H. and M. lordships could not very well understand the true meaning of those few lines put after the said answer of the said parliament; from whence however may in some sort be concluded, as if the plenipotentiaries of the parliament with the kings of Sweden and Denmark might return home from the place of treaty; yet however that their H. and M. lordships do undoubtedly expect, that in case such be the intention of the parliament, and that it be judged there, that they have reason for so doing, that the said reasons will be first communicated to their H. and M. lordships; and that nothing will be disposed of about it, but with joint consent; much less that any thing apart will be executed.

Cardinal Mazarin to Bordeaux, the French ambassador in England.

MY LORD,

St. Jean de Luz, 14. Octob. 1659. [N. S.]

I THANK you for the punctuality, which you observe in informing me of the state of affairs of England; I pray continue it. I will tell you in exchange, that this negotiation is almost finished; and that we have ordered the articles of the peace and marriage to be writ fair in French and Spanish, the consummation of the latter being deferred for some time, by reason of the season of the year, the infant not being able to come out of Spain; so that you will have time enough to come and take possession of your charge. Notwithstanding the carriage and countenance of the Spaniards, yet

A.D. 1659 I am perswaded, that they desire to have a peace with England, as well as with us; and that the peace may be universal; but I cannot answer for them positively. In the mean time I would not consent, that any thing should be inserted in regard of England in our treaty with Spain; only that in case the peace be not made between the two nations, France is not to assist the one or the other, and is to continue in an exact neutrality; which you may communicate where you are; and which I assure myself will be confirmed by Mons. Lockhart, who is at present here, and to whom I impart all that passeth here.

Capt. Clement Nédham to general Fleetwood.

MY LORD,

In the possession of the editor.

I AM given to understand, that the committee of officers, to whom the late paper from the general councell was recomitted, have added severall thinges beyond their instructions; as namely, that noe officer bee laid aside but by a court marshall; nor any comissionated by parliament, but what shall bee approved by the comittee of nomination. My lord, I know it's a pleasinge case to such as putt a higher value on their comissions, then on their duty to the parliament, from whom they received them. It seemes strange to mee, that this army, whoe could subject themselves and their comissions to the lusts of the late single person, to bee laid aside at the pleasure of him, whoe was but a servant as themselves, should now impose and limitt the supream authority of the nation. I never expect that injustice from a parliament, which I have seene practised by court-marshalls; witnes the cruell imprisonment and casheeringe of some faithfull officers, onely for mentioninge the intollerable prid and luxury of the late court; infoemuch as I heard some of these, that sate as judges, confesse they were acted by feare against their owne sight. I say again, I never heard of any such thinge done by parliament. My lord, I hope wee are all sensible, that the parliament have not oft used their power in this case, as from thence comes a great part of our miseries; for had they timely clipped the winges of their old generall, doubtles hee had never created an interest to destroy the authority, by which hee was raised; nor had the nation knowne the confusion and miseries they have since tasted; nay, I may say, this army had never beene tempted to such apostacy, as hath defiled our consciences before God, and our reputation to the world. My lord, wee are either servants, or masters: if masters, lett's tell the parliament, that wee onely called them to take the odium of raising money to mainteyne us, and lett them know what harmes they must expect; but, if wee be servants, raised and mainteyned by their authority, lett's bee ashamed to offer that to them, which wee would abhorre our owne servants should offer to us. My lord, your lordship hath many domestique servants, and I perswade myselfe, a sober family; and I thinke, while they carry themselves well, it were harshnes in your lordship to turne any one away, to bringe in another. But, my lord, if a servant should say, I challenge a right to contynue, unles discharged either by my fellow-servants, or my owne consent, though I know your lordship of a most myld temper, yett certainly you would thinke that servant unworthy to contynue in Wallingford house. My lord, as to what is proposed touchinge the comittee of nomination, I have not heard of above two or three officers in all the army, that have beene comissionated by parliament, but what have beene approved by that comittee; and by them the army have beene modled. I feare, my lord, the indigent families of many poore officers discharged by that comittee, have a lowd cry, as havinge received such measure, as never was mett by parliament, some regiments ten, some fourteen, and some twenty officers laid aside, that have served many of them seventeen or eighteen yeares, and never any crime laid to their charge, onely to gratify freinds and relations, many of which never drew sword in this service. Lett the world judge, whether it bee fitt to impose such steeresmen on a parliament. Nott that I speake it to detract from the worth of those honourable gentlemen of that comittee: I thinke it were lesse injury to say, they acted upon misinformation, then to lay such an imputation on the parliament, for what was done in their late votes. My lord, I have thus farre spoken as to the matter of that proposall; I shall now crave liberty to offer my thoughts as to the end thereof.

My lord, to my understanding the designe of that proposeall is to create an interest in the army, distinct to that of parliament and nation; and this (say some) is our best security against the spirit of the nation, which may possibly bee introduced in parliament. My lord, I find many your officers, especially those of the Northerne bridgades, much decry the constitutions of corporations, as emblems of monarchy. It seemes to mee incongruous, that the same men should strive to bringe the army into a corporation. My lord, were it possible to forme an army of saints in reallity, such as would undoubtedly abide stedfast, and could this army support itself either by its owne interest and property, or by extraordinary food from heaven, I should not deny them a charter as the most renowned corporated body on the face of the earth. But, my lord, seeinge A.D. 1659. this army consists of men subject to infirmity; that seeinge this army was raised by authority of the people of England, called forth to defend the birth-right and liberty of the meanest man in the nation, as well as their owne; that this army hath beene paid and mainteyned out of the purses of the same people, and cannot in future stand but by the same meanes; seeinge there remaines in this army but a handfull of those men, that beare the burthen and heate of the warre, many beinge retired to private callings, that have equally meritted with ourselves; that consideringe the distemper now on the spirit of the nation hath much of it arisen from the unstable spirit of the army, that had sett up what they pulled downe, and pulled downe what they sett up; and now (that I mistake not) seeme to assert an interest of their owne, independent from that of the nation, in which all the world will judge selfe to bee at the bottom; let us now thinke it our duty to settle on such a basis, as every man's interest may bee involved, and all men see their owne property and right mainteyned. Certainly hee, that doth righteously, shall have praise of men; and the laudable practice of this army tendinge to subjection to that authority, under which God hath soe much blessed us, shall alay the fury of the spirit of this nation, when they shall see righteousness and truth exalted in the midst of us, and every man shal be able to say, his interest is imbarqued in this bottom; the contrary hereof will turne every man's hand against us, and ours against every man. Lett us not thinke, that if wee goe out of the Lord, either our number, our horses, our armes, our successes, our courage, or skill can save us. Wee have seene with our eyes men of greater might then ourselves blasted by inconsiderable meanes. My lord, the most righteous government in the world might bee upheld by the sword: but the Lord deliver England from a sword-government! For my owne part, I was never an enemy to a single person, because such, but in that hee usurped power, beinge neither called thereunto by God nor man; and if twenty or thirty, nay a whole army, should usurpe government on the same tearmes, I should bee alyke mynded towards them; for 'tis not the number, that differenceth tyrants from lawfull magistrates. My lord, I thought my duty to offer your lordship this trouble, to the end, if you find any thinge of reason from hence against the offeringe of that proposeall, your lordship would stifle it in the birth, that such a thinge may never goe forth into the world to the shame of an army, that soe lately declared their sorrow for former backslidynges. I am,

My LORD,

Your lordship's most humble

and faithfull servant,

Lunæ, the 20th of October, 1659. [N. S.]

A.D. 1659.

WAS proposed to the assembly, that the farmers, by edict of the king of France, do import only, they themselves, trane-oil, and what else comes from the whale into France, do use great violence and force against the Netherland ships, which come to arrive there with trane-oil, for the account of others, striving directly against the common freedom of the nations, which are thereby excluded to trade with their wares in France, which they have in great quantity, and consequently prejudicial to the navigation and commerce, and that against the expresse right of treaties and alliances, which their H. and M. lordships have made with France; and upon this occasion, several propositions being made to cause the said monopoly to cease, and to be wholly taken away, and to restore the freedom of trade; and amongst the rest, that the province of Normandy is now altogether unprovided with trane-oil, which the farmers will have occasion to furnish, that the exporting of the same out of Holland and Zeland ought to be hindered, tho' it were but for two or three months, that thereby undoubtedly this monopoly would come to cease. Whereupon being debated, it is resolved, that the said project shall be sent to the respective colleges of the admiralties, for them to pass their considerations upon it, and to send them speedily to their H. and M. lordships.

A letter of intelligence.

SIR,

Vol. lxvi.
p. 1.

IHAD by the last post from you but three lines, and no share of your newes, except what the prints speakes of; yet are there verie remarkable things passed with you betwixt the parliament and the army, whereof other English letters by this post made mention of. I perceive by the few lines, that my silence causeth you to that brevity. You speake of two posts letters wanting; but I am sure you will finde it, that I have failed to write to you but one post, that is the 13th of September; but the next post after, that is, on the 20th of September, I have written to you the reason for writing that post; and so I have continued to write from post to post. As for newes, we have from Elfeneur of the 20th of September, that ours and the French embassaders did follow the king of Sweden into the island Falster, where they were arrived safe; but the king was gone from thence into another island, called Moen, before the embassaders arrived. The Hollands vice-admirall de Ruyter hath layne with his fleet all the time since our fleet hath been absent before Landskrohn, and hath hindered the Svedish fleet from comming out of the sayd port; and as yet we doe not heare, that the Hollander acts any hostillity against the Svedes, although they are farr stronger at sea then the Svedes at present. There is here great longing for to heare, how the Svedish envoye, Mons. Coyett, will be received from the general states of the United Provinces. It is very probable, they will not admitt him to audience, because the king of Sveden had slighted of late their plenipotentiaries, and had spoken so sharp words to them. They write from Holland, that the states general are resolved not to give to the sayd Svedish envoye audience, till the king of Sveden doeth declare to accept the project of agreement made at the Hague the 4th of August; to which the king of Sveden all this time would not submitt. By letters from Dantzic we have, that the 13th of October, new style, the governor of Marienburg, lieutenant-generall Bilau, with a strong svadron of horses and foot, is fallen into the Polish laguer, with intent to ruine the bridge, which the Poles have made over the river Nogatt: but the Poles have beaten them, and killed above an hundred men, took forty-seven prisoners, and drive them backe againe into the town. After this the Svedes fell into the Polish laguer againe, but with better success then before. They have slaine two hundred Poles, brought some prissoners into Marienburg; but they have not could ruin their bridge. The Danziger Host remaines still belaguered. From Elbing and Marienburg we have had no letters, not since the sixth of September, the passage of posts being stopped by the Poles. Stetin holds out stoutely against the Imperialists; and before Grypswald they was beaten, and forced to leave the siege. The Svedish field-marshall Wrangell hath releevd Grypswald, and is marching to Stetin, for to releve the sayd towen. The newes from Curland mentioned in my last of the fourth currant doeth continue: therefore needlesse to repeate the same. I pray, Sir, be pleased to impart to me, how the parlament and the army is agreed; agreed; and if you heare not, that the parlement will send to this town a publicke minister for to be their resident. This is all at present from

Your humble servant,

Homburg, 11. Octob. 1659.

DE LAWERIN.

For Mr. Isaac Johnson, merchant at London.

An account of the depredations committed by the Dutch upon the English; delivered to the Dutch ambassador by the committee, 11. Octob. 1659.

THAT Maurice Thomson and William Thomson, aldermen of London, with others, Vol. lxx. did in the year 1656 set forth the ships Lion, Providence, the Rappahannack, the Sarah, and the Fortune, upon trading voyages for Guiney, under the command of several English masters; and the said ships having made good voyages, and being richly laden upon account of the English, and upon the point of making their last port, and so to return for England, were in August and September, 1656, set upon and surpris'd by two Dutch ships, bearing then openly Dutch colours, viz. the Mary of Amsterdam, and the Unicorn of Middleborough, commanded by captain John Craell, of Muneke-dam in Holland; who took out all the lading of the said ships, and put all the English together into the Sarah, the worst of them, without having any goods therein, save a little bad victuals, not enough to keep them alive; and they had starved, had they not happened upon the St. Thomas island belonging to the Portugal, whereby they were forced to sell the ship to get provision and victuals to enable them to come for England. By the loss of which ships the said owners were damnified the sum of 52033 l. 15 s. sterling.

The said English merchants, for reparation of their said losses, sent over Mr. Harris their solicitor, and others, into Holland, to obtain justice in the ordinary course of law, who spent twelve months time in solicitation to no purpose; and having been at above 500 l. charges in prosecution, and tired out with delays, returned with no other account than this, that captain Kraell and the ship Unicorn (whom they had arrested) were both without bail released, albeit it was fully proved, that the owners and letters out of the said ships Mary and Unicorn were Dutchmen, living in Amsterdam and Middleburgh; and also that the said captain Kraell lived at Muneke-dam.

That alderman John Dethicke and company, Englishmen, having set forth the Bantam frigate, commanded by captain Isaac Taylor, from London, for a voyage to the East-Indies, to lade pepper, and to return to Europe therewith upon their account, Thomas Newman English merchant being their supra-cargo, the said frigate in August 1657 arrived at the road of India Poura, in the island of Sumatra in the East-Indies, and was freely admitted to trade and buy pepper there; and did buy as much pepper as would have fully laden the said ship, being in burden 210 tons.

That they did lade on board the said ship 672 bakards of pepper, and provided the rest to be laden on board within few days after. But so soon as the said 672 bakards of pepper were aboard, which was about the 11th of October, 1657, one Antonio van Voorst, commander of the ship Turtle-dove, in the service of the Dutch East-India company, with three pinnaces manned all with Dutchmen, arriving in the said road of India Poura, came and anchored round about the said Bantam frigate, and sent for the commander and supra-cargo on board the said Turtle-dove, and peremptorily charged and commanded them, that they should not trade there. Whereupon the said Newman told captain van Voorst, that he had bought his ship's full lading of pepper, and that some of it was on board, and the rest would be on board in three or four days, and then he would be gone. But the captain told them, if they would not depart, he would force them away. Whereupon captain Taylor and Mr. Newman went on board the Dutch captain, and told him, that they had laid out (besides the pepper on board) at India Poura 3000 dollars, and desired the same might be brought on board; but he told them, it should not; and if they did attempt it, he would take it away; and said, that all the trade for pepper on the West coast of Sumatra belonged to the Dutch East-India company. But Mr. Newman attempting notwithstanding to bring some pepper on board, the same was seized and detained on board the Turtle-dove. Whereupon the said Mr. Newman, captain Taylor, and one Gresham Howard the chief mate, on the 19th of October, 1657, protested against the said Dutch captain; and on the said 19th of October the Dutch captain forced them to depart thence, without taking in the remainder of the pepper, and sailed in company with their frigate, on purpose to disturb their trading in any other part of the Indies. And arriving at Bantam, the English were not permitted to trade there, but were forced to go

A.D. 1659. with the said van Voorst to Batavia; and being there summoned to appear before John Matsooken, general there for the said Dutch East-India company, he told them, that neither they nor any English should trade in any of the dominions of the queen of Acheine, and would not suffer them to lade any goods at Batavia aforesaid, but stopped twelve ton of ebony wood, that they had provided, and were carrying on board. And the said English were forced to depart away from Batavia with the Bantam frigate, and so to sail to Europe, and arrived at Leghorn with 96 tun dead freight. By which actings of the Dutch, as aforesaid, the owners of the said ship Bantam were damnified to the value of 9778 l. sterling money.

Maiden-head.

That Mr. Maurice Thomson and others, owners and employers of the ship Maidenhead, did in August, 1656, freight and set forth the said ship Maidenhead, upon a trading voyage to Jambe and Bantam, and from thence to Leghorn; that the said ship, having taken in part of her lading at Jambe, upon very disadvantageous terms, (occasioned by the inhancing of the price of pepper at that time by the Dutch) departed thence towards Bantam, to take in the rest of her lading, being fixty ton; and on the 5th of February, 1657, in her course thitherward, met with five men of war belonging to the Dutch East-India company, who made several shot at her, and forced the said ship to come to an anchor by them; and the master, when demanded, whither he was bound, answering for Bantam; and that if he attempted it, they would sink or burn her and her lading; and thereupon forced her back, under a guard of some of the said ship, till they were past the Bantamores dominions. By which means she went to Leghorn with fixty tons dead freight, to the damage of the petitioners, 3393 l. sterling.

Olive-tree.

That the merchants and employers of the ship Olive-branch did in May, 1656, freight the said ship with a fitting cargo for Bantam in the East-Indies, and from thence to Leghorn; that in December following, upon her arrival near Bantam, she was met with by some Dutch ships belonging to the East-India company of Holland; and after some shot made at her with bullets, was boarded by one of their captains, who commanded the master of the said ship to bear up to the Dutch admiral; and being come up, the admiral forbade him to go into Bantam with his ship, threatening, that if the master attempted to go in, he would sink him. Whereupon the master of the said ship, being denied the liberty of that port, was forced to put into Pollagundy, 25 leagues distant from that place, where they were forced to unlade and relade with pepper and sugar at far dearer rates than what might have been had at Bantam; and so came back with 63 tons dead freight. By which means the merchants freighters were damnified 1604 l. 13 s. 4 d. as plainly appears by depositions on oath; and the owners of the said ship, by the obstruction given to her in her said voyage, were damnified through loss of time, and deterioration of the said ship, in her hull and rigging, the sum of 2000 l.

Endymion.

That the ship Endymion in August, 1657, coming into the streights of Sunda, in her voyage from England, met with a single Dutch ship, who related, that the Dutch had commenced a war with the king of Bantam; and so accompanied the Endymion within sight of Pullapanijam, where were riding three Dutch ships more, who commanded the Endymion to come to an anchor near to them; which they did. They then summoned the commander captain Jervase Coachman to come on board their general. But the said captain being disenabled through sickness, sent his purser on board the said general; who returned with this answer to the commander from the general, that he would not permit the said ship to go into Bantam road, no nor so much as their boat to go off to advise the English company's agent of the said ship's arrival. And in this condition they kept the said ship for nine days, at the end whereof they sailed for Jambe, and there procured what pepper was to be had, and so came back again for Bantam, to have completed their tonnage; but they were again countermanded by three of the said Dutch ships, and sent for on board their general, and by him prohibited to go into Bantam road with their ship; but with much intreaty suffered them to send their boat on shore, to advise the English agent of their being there; who thereupon addressed himself to the Dutch general, intreating him to permit the said ship to come into Bantam road, to take in what goods were there in readiness for her: whose answer was, that he durst not undertake it without express order from Batavia, which caused the agent and council to speed their letters to Batavia to the governor general, desiring him to order, that the ship might be suffered to come into the road. But they received answer, that they would not suffer any ship to go, nor any going to or from the shore in any manner whatsoever. Whereupon the agent with Mr. James Bostock set sail in the ship Endymion for Batavia, supposing his presence might have effected somewhat to the answering their desires. But after many personal addresses, letters, and protests, they returned fruitless; whereby the said ship Endymion was forced to return to England with a considerable quantity of dead freight, the Dutch not suffering them them to fetch so much as water for their homeward-bound voyage. And further, the said A.D. 1659 ship's-boat being sent to cut some wood on an uninhabited small island, the Dutch fired a gun at the boat, commanding them on board to crave their permission, which they were forced to do, or else to return from whence they came. By which said actings of the Dutch towards the Endymion, the English merchants are damnified to the value of 10500 l.

The ship Jonathan of London was freighted by Maurice Thompson, Thomas Canham, Christopher Willoughby, John Page and company, and set forth from London upon a trading voyage to the East-Indies, and from thence back again to England. And in the month of January, 1656, the said ship took in on the coast of Cormandel a great quantity of goods to be carried to Bantam, and vended there. But in her course thither, about the aforesaid month of January, 1656, near an island called Palliapanjan, within few leagues of the road of Bantam, they met with five ships belonging to the Dutch East-India company, who told the master and company of the Jonathan, that they must not should go into Bantam; for that they lay there by order of the general of the Dutch East-India company at Batavia, to oppose them or any other ship from England, that should endeavour to go thither. Whereupon the master and company of the Jonathan desired the commander of the said Dutch ships to send on board and search their ship, assuring them they had no ammunition or prohibited goods on board, and earnestly intreated they might be permitted to go into Bantam, in regard they had divers sick men on board, and very much wanted fresh victuals and other necessaries. But the Dutch denied to search the said ship, or to let them go in; and the Jonathan notwithstanding endeavouring to steer in for Bantam, they at the Dutch ships shot at her, and commanded the master and cape merchant to come on board, or otherwise they would sink them. Whereupon the cape merchant and one of the mates of the Jonathan (the master being sick) went on board the Dutch admiral. And although they urged the necessity of their putting into Bantam for the reasons aforesaid, yet the said admiral expressly forbade them, and told them, if they attempted it again, he would take them prisoners, and sink their ship. Thereupon the master and company of the Jonathan drew up a protest against the Dutch, and intimated the same to the Dutch admiral, requesting his answer in writing. But he denied that also; and there being no possibility of getting into Bantam, they were necessitated to depart with their ship and goods to other places, and to dispose of the goods at very low rates, in respect of what they would have yielded at Bantam; besides, leaving at Bantam in money 3000 l. sterling, which was then ready to be received. By which means the said ship's voyage was almost quite frustrate and overthrown, and the freighters damnified to the value of 6000 l. sterling.

William Blake, Thomas Hopkins, and others, were owners of the ship Unity; which said ship being at Jeffenapatan in the island of Ceilon in the Indies, the said Thomas Hopkins, and William Jourdan master of the said ship, hired a certain vessel, called a champan, being of the burden of sixty tons, and loaded on board of the said vessel and the said ship Unity, at or near Bengal, Hughes, and Ballafore, in the parts of the East, several goods and merchandizes to be carried and transported for Jeffenapatan aforesaid. And the said two vessels accordingly sailed away, and arrived at Jeffenapatan in January, 1657, and were in the factory there discharged and all unladen (except 80 bales of saltpetre, and six mauns of opium); and while the said vessels were at Jeffenapatan aforesaid, there came news, that a fleet of Dutch ships had taken three Portugal frigats at Jussicurre, and also the island Manar; and on the twenty-sixth of February, 1657, there came to Jeffenapatan from Manar a Dutch army in small vessels, and besieged the same (the fleet, that brought that army, being commanded by general Richloof, and one captain Vanderlaine). And it being commonly reported, that the Dutch, having many Blacks, Bandanesses, Amboineses, and of Javah in their army, had promised them a pardo, valuing one piece of eight per head for every white head of persons slain by them, that they should bring; the master and company of the said vessel Unity, and champan, were forced to fly for their lives, some to the Portugal fort, and others to the said ship Unity; and the next day after their flight the Dutch came and possessed themselves of the said English factory at Jeffenapatan, and of all the goods there on account of the English, and particularly of the goods, that were brought in the said ship Unity, except those undelivered, as aforesaid; and utterly deprived the English of the same. The said ship Unity after the escape aforesaid, being ballasted, watered, and rigged at the isle of Cays, and sailing towards the port of Ballafore, was on the third of March, 1657, met with by a Dutch frigate, called the Massapore, being rear-admiral of the Dutch Pullacat fleet, commanded by schipper Andres; who after a whole day's chace came up with them, and commanded the master of the Unity on board them; where being come, they took him prisoner, and sent a corporal and two soldiers on board the Unity, and carried her to Negapatan, where they met the Dutch vice-admiral; and thence the Massapore frigate weighed with the Unity to seek the

A.D. 1659. the Dutch admiral; and sailing towards Tringcombar, met the said admiral named John Williamson in a fleet called the Pullacat, who ordered them to return back to Carrical, to speak with the chief Dutch merchant at Tringcombar, named Mr. Newland; and arriving there, and going on shore to him, the master of the Unity demanded of him, why they detained him and his ship and company, being English and in English service; who answered, that he had order from the lord Pitts governor of Pullacatt, and the lord Richloof the Dutch general, to seize all vessels and persons English or others trading or sailing to or from Jeffenapatan. And so the said Newland seized the said ship Unity with the said 8 bales of petre, 6 maunds of opium, and pieces of striped stuff, that were undelivered at Jeffenapatan afore said; and took the said goods out of Carricall, and laded the Unity with rice for Jeffenapatan, and sent the master of her and his company prisoners to Richloof; and being come to him, the said general and the lord Vanderlawne called them villains, and asked them how they durst come to trade with their enemies, and told them their ship and goods were lost; and that besides they deserved to be hanged. And the said general sent the said master and his company prisoners from place to place till the 27th of August, and then released them at Pullacatt; whereupon they went (being poor and tattered) to a place called Madraspatan, belonging to the English; and the said master at several places, in the Indies discoursing with the Dutch, touching the seizure of the English ships and goods in those parts, they always answered, that they followed the orders of their masters (meaning the Dutch East-India company); and what they did therein, their said masters would answer at home. By the seizure of which said ship Unity, and the goods aboard her, and the Champan afore said, the merchants interested are damnified to the value of 10046l. 7s. 6d.

Advice.

The ships Advice, burden about 370 ton, Robert May commander, and the Dragon, of about 250 tons, Nicolas Baddiford commander, were in May, 1658, employed by the governor and company of English merchants, and laden with goods and money to a great value, and bound for Bantam in the East-Indies, and there to be reladed for England.

The Advice arrived at Anjar near Bantam, the 15th of October, 1658; and upon her arrival a prau was sent off from the English house to bring on board the fresh provisions under the command of one Peter Cook; who fearing himself to go on board in regard of some Dutch ships riding there, sent off a canoe with an English flag, and two of the company's servants, on board one of the Dutch ships, to know whether the prau might go on board or not. But the Dutch seized on the canoe, servants, and flags, and kept the same, and would not permit the said provisions to go on board: and the said ship Advice arriving the next day by the commander of the Dutch fleet under Pullapanjan, he surrounded the said ship with five Dutch ships, and commanded the English factors on board him. And although they acquainted the Dutch, who were their employers, and earnestly desired leave to go into Bantam road, and dispose of themselves according to commission; the Hollanders answered, That they had expresse command to the contrary from their general in Batavia; and without expresse order from him they would not permit them any access to Bantam, or to send thither, or to receive any thing from thence, or any advice. So that they were forced to send two persons to Batavia to treat with the Dutch general; but they returning no answer, the ship Advice failed thither.

Dragon.

The Dragon being arrived at Pullambenn point, they espied 6 sail of Dutch ships, 5 leagues distant; one of which, coming within shot of the Dragon, never haled her, but fired a gun at her laden with shot, which the Dragon answered. And then the said ship fired two guns more, which the Dragon also answered; and the Dragon being then clear of her, came and anchored in Bantam road, and sailing from thence for Jambe on the last of October, met with 3 Dutch ships, and coming to an anchor, in regard the weather was calm, and the current against her, the said Dutch ships came also to an anchor by them, and forced the captain of the Dragon to come on board their admiral; where being come, the said admiral detained him and Mr. Middleton, one of the merchants of the said ship Dragon, and carried them and the Dragon for Batavia; and being there arrived, put ten Dutchmen on board the Dragon, and sent the captain of her and Mr. Middleton ashore as prisoners, and kept them so about six days. And notwithstanding the English company's factors at Batavia for above a month's time together did solicit the Dutch general there, both by letters and personal addresses, to get admittance into Bantam, and liberty to relade their ships for England, they could not obtain the same; by which actions of the Dutch as afore said the said English East-India company are damnified as followeth, by the hindering the said ship Advice, and interrupting her in her trade, the sum of 15794l. 6s. and also by the said ship Dragon the sum of 10787l. in all the sum of 26581l. 6s.

The

The ship Mayflower, burden about 280 tons, William Curtis commander, was in the A.D. 1659. year 1658 employed by the governor and the English East-India company to go and lade pepper at the island of Sumatra; and upon the said ship's arrival at Acheine, they procured leave of the queen to lade with pepper; and accordingly sending off a boat with pepper to the said ship, the same was seized by the order of Balthasar Bort, commander of three ships then in Acheine road in the immediate service of the Dutch East-India company, who also forbid and prohibited them to bring any more pepper from thence; so that the said ship's voyage was wholly disappointed, and the ship forced to continue abroad a twelve-month longer than she needed, if she had laded there. And the commander of the said ship, demanding the pepper so seized, was denied the same, or any satisfaction for it: by which means the said English East-India company are damnified to the value of 11774 l. 16 s. 10 d. besides what damage may further accrue, the said ship Mayflower being still abroad.

The ship Benjamin, being freighted by English merchants, and bound for Surat, sailing by cape Ranlis near Goa, in November, 1656, was in the open sea set upon by two Dutch men of war, though they had their English colours out, &c. who outrageously assaulted them, fired broad-sides and vollies of small shot into them, wounding seven or eight of their men, and at last took them by force, and kept the ship divers days as prize, till their vice-admiral came and released them upon the commander's captain Arnold Brown signing a note, that he had received no wrong, which he was forced to sign, ere he could be cleared. And after all this they could not be suffered to take out of an English ship called the Hopewell, riding in the port of Goa, saltpetre, pepper, and other goods provided for the said ship Benjamin, nor to send a boat to the said ship; nor durst the said ship come out to them, for fear of the like usage; by which means the said merchants interested in the Benjamin are damnified in the sum of 8830 l.

The ship Affada, merchant, sailing from Surat, (and before the Dutch had begun their war with the Bantamers) arrived at Bantam, there discharging her lading, was freighted for Cambosa; at her returning from which place a Dutch vessel, coming over the bar, was lost; but by the help and assistance of the Affada merchants company the lives of eight Dutchmen were preserved, taking them in their ship for Bantam; and there sent them on board one of the Dutch ships, and so intended to sail into the road; but the Dutch fired 3 pieces of ordnance at them, commanding the merchant, Mr. Nicolas Buckeridge, aboard their admiral; where presently sentence was pronounced of sending them away to Batavia, not suffering them to send a boat on shore to land their goods brought from Cambosa intended for England, or fetch off any part of such goods as were ashore in Bantam, provided for markets in India, to the great loss of the English company, and other proprietors in the said ship.

The Golden Cook, a small vessel, having procured her lading of pepper to tranship on board the Employment, the Dutch, having notice thereof, manned out a vessel of 20 guns to surprise her pepper from on board her; but it pleased God to frustrate their design.

Extract out of the register of the resolutions of the H. and M. L. states general, &c.

Jovis, the 23d of October, 1659.

RECEIVED a letter from the college of the admiralty at Amsterdam, writ the 21st Vol. lxvi. instant, containing an answer to their H. and M. L. letter of the 11th instant, and P. 59. consequently advice upon the projects mentioned therein, to cause to cease the progress of the new impost laid upon the ladings of foreign ships, having laden in some ports or roads of France, to come in or unlade in the harbours, roads and towns of the United Provinces, upon the penalties to be prefixed by their H. and M. L. Having also received a letter from the college of the admiralty in Friseland, writ at Harlingen the 10. instant, concerning the said subject: whereupon being debated, it is resolved, that copies of the said letters shall be sent to the said ambassador Nieupoort, to dispose the government in England, to the end that they, in opposition against the introduction of the said impost by the said prohibition to be made to their inhabitants respectively, will concur with their H. and M. L. The lord Van Ommeren is also hereby desired to speak with the resident Aytzema, to the end, that the Hans towns will also concur therein with their H. and M. L. in opposition of the said new impost, and prohibit their inhabitants accordingly.

Samedy, le 18^{me} d'Octobre, 1659. [N. S.]

A.D. 1659.

Vol. lxvi.
P. 37.

LE sieur de Heyde a esté voir le sieur commissaire Downing, luy faisant plainte et recommandation, touchant le navire Marc Aureille, entré par tempeste en Pleymouth, et illec arresté; sur quoy il a promis avec beaucoup de civilité, que non seulement en cela, mais en toute autre chose il fera tout ce qu'on requerra de luy. Ce que les deputés des estats ont à luy recommander se voit par la resolution du 14^{me} d'Octobre.

Le sieur president a esté prest à conclurre pour les 4 seigneuries dans la meyerie de Deurne, de Bellicom, item de Risoir, et de Mierlo. Mais cela est encore fursys.

Le conseil d'estat a avisé, qu'il fera necessaire d'accroistre ou augmenter la cavaillerie de 2000 chevaux, à fin que par terre et sur les frontiers l'on soit aussy bien en posture que par mer.

Lundy, le 20^{me} dito.

Le commis Spronsen a rapporté d'avoir rendu au sieur resident Charifius, disant, que l'estat ne pouvoit pas accepter des clauses choquants, qui estoient dans iceux: sur quoy il declaroit avec beacoup de civilité, qu'il n'avoit jamais eu intention de choquer ou offenser l'estat aucun membre d'iceluy; que cela repugnoit à sa bonté et naturel, plustost enclin à endurer qu'à faire mal. Mais qu'en ayant déjà entendre auparavant il en avoit escrit au roy. Et par ainfty les memoires sont seposés et tenus comme non donnés et exterminés des registres.

A Amsterdam sont chargés quelques navires avec de l'huile de baleine traen pour France; mais d'autant qu'en France on maligne avec celle marchandise-là, la Hollande a proposé d'interdire ce transport.

De Copenhagen ne sont pas venu des lettres; mais du sieur admiral en sont venues du 10^{me} Octobre, d'entre Langelandt et Lalandt, parlant des furieuses tempestes et vents, qu'il a enduré. Semble qu'il alloit à Copenhagen.

Mardy, le 21^{me} dito.

Le sieur de Renswoude president a proposé, que son fils en la cour d'Espagne entourré de gens d'autre religion, et qu'il court risque d'estre gaigné par ces gens, et induit a quitter sa religion. Pourtant proposé et requiert, qu'à luy soit donné et envoyé un ministre de la religion reformée. Ceux de Hollande et Zelande ont cela overgenomen. De la part de l'electeur de Coloigne il y a eu un envoyé; qui a proposé touchant Lith, ou la jurisdiction et superiorité; requerant que cela soit vuidé par des neutraux, et que cependant la possession demeure comme elle est.

L'on a conçu quelque ordre pour envoyer au sieur Boreel touchant l'huile de baleine. Sur quoy la France semble un peu maligner.

La Zelande a proposé, qu'on devroit envoyer une ambassade extraordinaire vers le roy de France, à fin de menager la France, et prevenir toute dispute et mal-entendre avec ce royaume.

Mecredy, le 22^{me} dito.

Les envoyés de Zale ont ce matin eu leur audience d'adieu ou de dimission. Ils ont par l'interpretation du Gool, professeur es langues orientales, dit beaucoup de compliments et louanges de la belle policie et ordre, qu'ils ont icy remarqué, spécialement à la Haye; et mesme parmy tant des religions et croyances, l'on tient tout en si bonne paix et repos, &c. puis ont rendu graces de la reception, accueil, et defrayement. L'on a reduit le tout en forme de quelque traité signé de costé et d'autre.

Le sieur Boreel escrit, que le sieur Lockart iroit faire rapport de ses conferences avec grand apparence de paix pour l'Angleterre avec l'Espagne; de quoy on est icy aucunement surprins et estonné. Car l'interest de cest estat n'est pas, que ces puissants voisins soyent appaisés; comme devenants tant plus considerable et formidable à cest estat.

L'on est aussy peu content de ce que le sieur Nieuport escript, que l'Angleterre demeure si froid envers les affaires du Nort. Qu'elle plaint des grands depens faits pour la Nort; montant à bien 600,000 livres sterlings. Item, qu'elle declare de ne savoir pas, lequel des deux roys soit refusant.

Jeudy, le 23^{me} dito.

L'admirauté d'Amsterdam a avisé sur la resolution du 20^{me} d'Octobre, qui parle d'enerver, pas des contraires interdictions l'octroy de la compagnee de l'huile de baleine en France. Item, sur ce qu'en France on continue decharger les navires estrnagés avec certain lastgelt: L'admirauté en Frise a aussy escrit touchant les mesmes choses. Tout est mis es mains des commissaires, pour examiner et en faire rapport.

SIR,

Vol. lxvi.
p. 61.

ON saturday night last the Water-drinker, a ship which came out of the Streights, valued at above 3 millions of gilders, was cast away in Zeland. Here arrived some commissioners from the town of Munster, desiring the states to put a garison in that town, in like manner as that of Embden. They offer one of the fairest churches to the use of the Protestants. What the states resolution will be, a little time will discover.

It's said, that captain Bancker, coming out of the Sound with Monf. Coyet, as embassador from the king of Sweden, is cast away about the point of Schagen; but the seamen and passengers are saved.

De Witt to Nieupoort, the Dutch ambassador in England.

MY LORD,

Hague, 24. October, 1659.

Vol. lxvi.
p. 63.

I HAVE received yours of the 17th, and I am sorry to understand thereby, that those of the government of England should make so little account of performing their word; and likewise so to behave and comport themselves in regard of this state or the inhabitants thereof, as reason and the laws of nations doth require: however I expect nevertheless by the next, according to the hope which you give me, the signed convention about piracy.

The exception made there upon the defect of the declaration of the public ministers, which of both the northern kings may be the refusant, is in my mind very insignificant and improper; and is fully convincing, that there is no good to be expected from that side, as well for the clearness of the business, as also in regard of what hath been done over and above; as doth appear by the act of both sides ministers, sent you in my last.
 Yet however I think it very necessary, that the parliament be given to understand by solid reasons the injury and wrong, which is done us through the non-representation of the

the made agreements; and that they be summoned to the effectual observing of the same. A.D. 1659.

I dare not proceed to move any thing concerning any further alliance to be made with England, till I see some effects of those conventions, which we have already made with that state, and you may freely signify so much to Sir H. Vane and others; for really this state can expect no better usage from any future treaty, which shall be made with England, till they see them make good what they have formerly concluded. And I cannot behold the affairs of the world (according to my apprehension) no otherwise, but that it will be impossible for those of the present government there to prevent by any other means than by a public alliance with this state, the dangers, which hang over their heads from within and from without. Yea, in case they continue in this manner to give reasons of offence to this state, I do verily believe, that those, who at present frame great designs against them, will be thereby animated to put the same resolutely in execution. It may be, that they can see their business more clear, and apprehend the same better, than we can from hence; but in my poor judgment they act so imprudently, and steer such unjust courses, that unless they speedily alter and mend the same, they in a short time will suffer very great shipwreck.

De Thou, the French ambassador in Holland, to Bordeaux, the French ambassador in England.

MY LORD,

Hague, 24. October, 1659. [N. S.]

I HAVE received yours of the 17th, which gives me advice of the petition presented to the parliament by the officers of the army, upon which they were to debate the next morning; and in regard the said petition is full of submissions, it was hoped, that all would pass in a reciprocal satisfaction, and so the calm would subsist where you are. And this is that, which was confirmed to me by Monsieur Downing, who gave me a visit yesterday, and shewed me a letter from Monsieur Lockhart, of the 3d instant, from St. John de Luz, wherein he writes him word, that the greatest difficulties were determined, which had staid the marshal of Grammont, and the cardinal was to depart very suddenly to go and meet them at Tholouse, whither he the said Monsieur Lockhart was to accompany him. For the affairs here, I send you a copy of a deliberation, wherein you will see the orders sent to Monsieur Nieupoort, to make instance in regard of the affairs of the north, from whence I have had no news since my last; so that I can write none: only these lords here expect the issue of an enterprize, which was to be made upon Funen, by the transport of the troops of the elector, which were met to that end at Kiel; and that, which gave hopes of the good success of this enterprize, was, that the king of Sweden had wholly unfurnished that island, by drawing away his forces from thence to send them to Zeland, Schonen, and Pomerania, from whence the news is, that the prince elector, designing to take Gripswall by force, had been twice beaten off in two assaults with considerable loss, the place being very well provided with men.

Monsieur Coyet not arriving doth cause credit to be given to the advice, which is come from Amsterdam, that the ship, in which he came, is cast away at the Cattegat. This will be a great hindrance to affairs, and chiefly to the accommodation of the north; the minister, as is said, being charged with propositions very pleasing to this state, which is easily to be believed, by reason of the great endeavours used here by the party of the confederates to hinder his reception; but it is most certain, the advice, which is here of the perishing of a very rich ship of this country in the sight of Flushing, the said ship being laden with bars of silver coming from Spain.

A letter of intelligence.

MONSIEUR,

A St. Jean de Luz, ce 27. Octobre, 1659. [N. S.]

LE duc de Lorraine est en liberté, et arrivé à Iron, un quart de lieu au dessus de Font-arabie, ou il sejourne, et va conferer avec Don Louis de Haro. Hier son eminence, accompagnée de toute la cour, et des Messieurs de Guise, et le comte de Harcourt, alla au devant luy à une lieue d'icy; et après-dîné et une longue secrete conference, le dit sieur duc, suivy des gardes de Mons. le cardinal, retourna au dit bourgh d'Iron. Ce matin les deux ministres ont esté à la conference, en dessein de signer tous les articles qu'ils ont fait, et arresté ensemble durant vingt et une conference; mais les affaires du dit duc l'ont occupé toute la journée, et la signature a esté remise à la premiere, non sans grand déplaisir de tous ceux qui les suivent.

Nous

A.D. 1659. Nous avons desja nommé le jour de nostre depart, et sommes reculez comme les autres. Demain le roy d'Angleterre entrera dans Fontarabie, malgré l'ambassadeur d'Angleterre, qui est icy, et confere incessamment avec celui du Portugal, lequel aupres deux audiences, qu'il a eu de son eminence, est resolu d'envoyer le resident vers les Hollandois, auxquels il fera des offres et propositions très-avantageuses. Le dit ambassadeur agit aussy incessamment aupres des Anglois, prevoyant que le roy d'Espagne fera ses derniers efforts par terre et par mer contre les rebels. Nous eusmes hier nouvelles de Monf. le mareschal de Grammont, qu'il a esté reçu de Madrid plus magnifiquement que je ne puis exprimer, et reviendra bientost chargé des presents, et tout ce que l'on demande pour le repos de la Chrestienté. Nous ne parlons icy d'autres choses, que des dons et magnifiques receptions, que les François reçoivent d'Espagne; qui pourtant n'esgalent pas ceux que son excellence a envoyé à Don Louis de Haro, et aux autres ministres du roy catholique; mais l'on parle d'une tapisserie d'une prix inestimable, qui sera présenté à son excellence de la part de sa majesté catholique, sitost que les dits articles sont signés, &c.

GENTLEMEN,

In the possession of the editor.

WE are appointed by the general council of officers to send you a copy of their agreement, which was consented unto and resolved on tuesday the eighteenth of this instant, which we accordingly herewith send you; it being likewise referred at the same time to this committee to take care, that it be tendered to every respective regiment, troop, company, and garison, who shall be found free to sign the same. We have in pursuance thereof thought fit to send you this inclosed, which we desire you to propose to all officers and foldiers under your command, for the ends aforesaid; which being done, you are to return it with the subscriptions, with all convenient speed, to the lord Fleetwood, commander in chief.

The peace and unity of the army, being much concerned in the dispatch thereof, we doubt not but all care and diligence will be performed by you. We remain,

GENTLEMEN,

Your loving brethren and fellow-soldiers,

Whitehall, Octob. 19. 1659.

J. LAMBERT,	JOHN DISBROWE,
ED. SALMON,	T. BISCOE,
JOHN DABERON,	S. CLARKE,
JO. MASON,	THOMAS TALBOT,
THO. KELSEY,	OLIVER EDGE,
JER. CAMFIELD,	FRAN. ALLEN.

P. S. It is desired, that the officers and foldiers may sign together, of each respective troop and company. You are likewise to leave a large margin, equal with the margin in the print, to the end, that the subscriptions of the army may be bound up together.

De Witt to Nicupoort.

MY LORD,

Hague, Oct. 31. 1659. [N.S.]

Vol. lxvi.
p. 79.

MY last to your lordship was of the twenty-fourth of this month: since is the post from England with the letters not come, which we very much long for, not doubting but the same will bring us advice of the conclusion of the convention about the subject of piracy, and better effects from that side in performance of the conventions made upon the Eastern affairs, for the more satisfaction of their H. and M. L. upon their resolution of the fourteenth instant. The resoluteness and readiness, which is used and shewn here upon all that doth concern England, ought, in my mind, to be requited and received with more equity and precise observation of the promises and words passed between them. You may see by the inclosed memorandum of the secretary Richard, what ill-will their H. and M. L. do draw upon themselves by their said resoluteness; and if so be all this will not effect so much, that at least those of England should make good their word to this state, I will believe, that they will easily conclude, that the affection of this side towards them will also decrease.

By the inclosed letters of the lords extraordinary commissioners to the kings of Sweden and Denmark, and especially by that writ to the lord greffier of the fourth instant, you will perceive, perceive, that the lords English plenipotentiaries do make scruple upon the point of the A.D. 1659. 400000 rix-dollars, concerning which Mons. Downing must acknowledge, that there was no other opinion by the contractors, than that the said point should be likewise a necessary condition, as he hath also in conferences declared several times the same to be the opinion of the parliament according to the instruction, which was sent him presently after the adjusting of the said convention. I hope you will be able to effect, that the said parliament shall order the said plenipotentiaries not to exceed the same about it, much less against the declared intention of the contractors, wherein my own particular is also very much concerned; for I have with great assurance, out of the mouth of Mons. Downing, given that information to their noble great lordships, that the said point, according to the intention of this state, was also necessary; and that upon that information, not without contradiction and protestation of the chiefeft members, the convention of the twenty-fourth of July last was approved of by their noble great lordships.

The assembly of the lords states of Holland is summoned again to-day against the eleventh of the next month.

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Samedy, le 25. d'Octobre, 1659. [N. S.]

SUR plainte des officiers du pais de Fauquement il y eust hier conference, mesme avecque assistance du conseil d'estat, comme requis d'aviser ce qu'on pourroit faire pour remedier contre les executions & pilleries des Espagnols, ayants envoyé quelque renfort de milice environ ce pais-là : le conseil de l'estat, au moins le Sieur Vander Hooge aura avisé, que ces executions des Espagnols comme iniques devroient estre réparée par repressailles. Mais le Sieur Veth avoit contredit cela, disant, que l'y avoit un bon traité fait entre l'ambassadeur d'Espagne & ceux de cest estat, ce qu'il valoit mieux d'en faire le partage, & que le Sieur Beverning avoit en main certain bon project & concept de partage, qui avoit apparence de plaire à l'Espagne, & qu'il falloit attendre son retour, & puis l'on en escriroit à l'ambassadeur.

Vol. lxvi.
p. 67.

L'on remarque clair, que le dessein de l'admiral Ruyter soit d'attenter sur Funen, ayant pour c'est effect embarqué 3000 ou 4000 de la milice de cest estat : & pour embarquer 3000 chevaux & 1000 à pieds Danois sous le generall Schacke alloit à Kiell.

Touchant l'edict de France, defendant le fritage des navires estrangerers, devant que les François ayent leur charge, & resolu, de parler aussy avecque les Hanseatiques ou Osterlins.

Lundy, le 27^{me} dito.

Le Sieur resident Charisius a présenté deux memoires : dans l'une il remercie de ce que l'on a accommodé son roy de ces 60 mille francs ; requirant continuation, &c. dans l'autre il requiert permission de faire levée de milice au service de sa majesté, disant : qu'il y a icy des officiers & de l'argent pour ce faire. Cela est aussy consenty : aucuns dirent, que donc la necessité & disette n'estoit pas si grande.

Le Sieur president a rapporté que le ministre d'Espagne avoit salué les estats generaux de la part de l'ambassadeur d'Espagne, par un memoire à demandé libre exportation de quelque bagage de Don Jean. Dans l'autre à fait plainte de ce que les gens & officiers de cest estat tratoient si mal les habitans du pais d'Outre-meuse. La premier est accordé : mais que le marquis de Caracene signe l'acte de specification du bagage, le second est mis en mains, &c.

Le Sieur Wickefort a notifié par le Sieur president la venue du duc de Brunswyck : l'on n'a pas resolu de le complimenter par aucuns députés ny mesme par l'agent de Heyde : ains si le Sieur Wickefort revient auprès du president, il luy dira, que sa venue est agreeable, &c.

L'on a trouvé bon de donner à chaque envoye de Salée une chaine & medaille de 400 francs, & une livre contenant la description des provinces unies ; & un semblable livre mieux relié & illuminé pour le prince de Salée ; & une semblable chaine pour le professeur Gool.

L'assemblée hesterne fust sur deux lettres de l'admirauté d'Amsterdam, l'un contenant plainte de ce, que les provinces ne fournissoient point d'argent ; l'autre estoit encore touchant le nouveau lastgelt en France ; conseillant de ne l'urger pas trop à present.

Mardy, le 28. dito.

Entre autres sont requis & accordes 200 paires de bottes de pescheurs, qui seront envoyés vers Dennemarc.

Le Sieur Gent n'ayant pas esté present hier, a proposé à ce matin estre estrange, que hier on avoit negligé d'envoyer à bienviengner & complimenter le duc de Brunswick Hanover ;

sur

A.D. 1659. sur quoy est trouvé bon, que non pas l'agent de Heyde, mais le Sieur de Gent mesme, membre de l'assemblée, ira complimenter le dit duc.

Il y a eu une longue lettre de Lubeck & Hamborgh complaignant, que les navires de Lubeck allants vers Stockholm, & menés à Copenhagen, dont l'un desja estoit relasché : requirants aussy la relaxation de l'autre. Cela est mis en mains des commissaires.

Jeudy, le 30. dito.

L'on a resolu d'escire aux commendeurs d'Embden & Lieroort de prester la main forte aux estats d'Ost-Frise à collecter ce qu'ils doivent à cest estat ; non obstant l'inhibition du Ost-Frise.

En outre est resolu de requirer le conseil d'estat à executer le dit duc pour payer aussy ses trois termes, qui montrent presque à 200 mille francs.

Il se trouve que le duc de Hanover a reconduit l'ambassadeur de France jusques à la carosse. Il aura du depuis déclaré, qu'il n'a pas reconduit le baron de Gent si avant, à cause que le dit baron par civilité s'y oppose : & le duc ne s'opiniastra pas. Aussy le duc aura pretendu, qu'on eust deu luy envoyer plus que un.

Vendredy, le 31. dito.

Les ministres de son altesse electorale de Brandenburg ont derechef insisté pour avoir resolution ou responce sur leurs memoires precedents ; & specialement sur les dix points & l'assurance pour le retour des troupes, que S.A. electorale enverroit vers Dennemarc ; lesquels points n'aguere on a veu imprimés.

Le Sieur Downing a reclamé l'Aigle, d'un des navires de Lubeck, venant de Revel, & mené à Amsterdam. Et sur ce que l'on dit, que cela se doibt reclamer devant l'admirauté à Amsterdam, il dit que l'admirauté ne fait pas droit : il desire que les estats generaux le luy fassent ravoïr ; autrement, &c. En effect les admirautés ont par fois besoin de telles illuminations. Pisces minutos comest.

Commissioner Vander Honart to the states general.

H. and M. LORDS,

Dantzick, Nov. 1. 1659. [N. S.]

Vol. lxvi.
p. 87.

MY lords, since my last I have had it confirmed, that the Polish court is removed from Warsaw to Mema or Dirschaw, to be so much the nearer to shorten the journey of the lords de Lombres and Akakia, who are with the Swedish court at Elbing, to dispose them to accept of Oliva for the place of treaty. Some of the lords ambassadors, that were at Warsaw, are daily expected here ; others will stay by the said king ; but whether the Swedes will agree to the said place, is still uncertain.

The lord Penbergh, extraordinary commissioner of the king of Denmark, is here also arrived, as I understand, but hath not yet made himself known ; for what reasons, I know not. Upon and out of the Hooft and Marienborch, there hath been of late here heard much shouting ; and those of the Hooft in a fally out, which they made yesterday, slew many Dantzickers, without yet doing any damage to the approaches. Both those places run great danger of being taken, unless the famine, which is very great in the Polish leaguer, and whereof many already dead, happen to relieve them.

Vogelsang to Ruysch.

MY LORD,

Copenhagen, 5. Nov. 1659. [N. S.]

Vol. lxvi.
p. 99.

ALTHOUGH I understand underhand some time since, how that they were debating here about sending a considerable embassy to their H. and M. L. yet I durst not advise so much then, by reason the event was uncertain ; but now the same is agreed on, and the lords are already appointed for the same, who are the lords Otto Kraegh and Boeckwaert out of Holstein. I am also informed, that they intend to send the lord Rantzow in the like quality to the commonwealth of England.

I have a copy of a certain letter of the lord ambassador Nieuport to the lord greffier, of the twenty-seventh, wherein he desireth order, to the end the freight of 600 chaldron of coals might be paid in Copenhagen : but I could rather wish, that the said payment might be made in some place in our own country ; for money is so very scarce here, that it will be impossible to procure such a sum here as 3600 rix-dollars ; so that I heartily desire there may be some other course taken in it. The said contract doth cause great joy here. What progress

progress hath been made in the design carried on by their H. and M. L. under the vice-Admiral de Ruyter, we have yet no certain news; but it is to be lamented, that so much brave time hath been lost.

MY LORD,

P. VOGELSANG.

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Le 1. Novembre, [1659. N. S.]

IL y a grande contestation entre la Hollande & autres provinces, pour les 60,000 francs, dont cy-devant tant de fois est parlé, qui devoient estre fournis au roy de Dennemarc. Vol. lxvi. p. 101.

Les autres pretendent, que la Hollande devroit fournir cela; mais la Hollande le decline, & desire, que le conseil d'estat le doive negotier à interest. En fin est conclu, qu'on doive encore requerir l'avis du conseil d'estat. Ruyter escrit lamentablement du peu de provision, qu'ont les navires de sa flotte, si que'lles feront en grand peine, si la flotte avec la victuaille ne vient pas bien tost.

L'admirauté d'Amsterdam encore est derechef pressée pour avoir le subsidie des provinces, pleignant qu'elle ne vient point.

Le 2. Novembre.

Ceux du prince d'Orange desireroient bien, que le dit prince vint dans l'assemblée des estats generaux, pour y prendre congé devant qu'aller à Leyde, et ce en suite de ce que ses devanciers souloient faire: les autres provinces n'y feroient point de difficulté; mais la Hollande donne à connoître, qu'elle ne le permettra pas, disant que le prince n'a point de caractère ny qualité pour ce faire.

En Orange est encore trouble, le roy de France ayant ordonné, que le peage au Rone. se payast au receveur de la princesse royale. Le conte de Dona a envoyé arrester toutes navires, qui n'ont pas payé à son receveur. Le roy de France a envoyé une fregatte pour affranchir le passage. Le comte de Dona aura envoyé des musquetons pour chasser la fregatte.

La princesse royale ira avec le prince à Leyden pour un nuit ou deux, pour le mettre en trein. L'on parle, que le magistrat à Leyden defrayera le prince durant ses estudes pour la convivise.

La princesse royale ne veut pas baiser le duc de Brunswick, & pourtant il ne la veut pas aller voir.

Le 3. Novembre.

Le Sieur & Weyman de la part des princesses royale & douariere ont esté voir le president, & luy ont notifié le depart du prince, & l'offre de sa bonne affection & correspondance. Sur quoy c'estant rapporté dans les estats generaux, la Geldre dit, que l'on devroit faire rendre le compliment par le president de la Hollande, & principalement le Sieur raet-pensionnaire dit, que le prince n'estoit qu'un enfant & sans caractère; & qu'il n'estoit pas besoin de le recomplimenter. La Zelande avisa, qu'on le devoit recomplimenter en forme: les provinces suivantes aussy mesme par des deputés de toutes les provinces; mais en fin a prevalu, qu'on le complimenteroit par 4 deputés, le Sieur Huygens, Ripperse, Stavenisse, & Renswoude.

Le Sieur Ommeren a rapporté de la conference tenue sur une des deux navires de Lubec, mené à Copenhagen: sur quoy est resolu, qu'on en prendra avis de tous les colleges de l'admirauté. Le mal est, que les villes de Lubec & Hamburgh ne peuvent pas parler le mesme langage, que parle l'Angleterre.

L'on n'a pas encore aucune certitude de la sorte de la flotte. La lettre de Ruyter est mis en mains des commissaires.

Le 4. Novembre.

Il y a eu une lettre du conseil de Brabant pour estre esclaircy sur quelque point dans le proces pendant entre le baron de Meroode, & le résident Roomer, sur quoy il y eust quelque contestation entre le Sieur raet-pensionnaire & la Zelande, laquelle favorisoit le Sieur Roomer: ou moins pour l'expedition de la justice.

Il y a eu encore quelque avis du college de l'admirauté du Noorde quartier, touchant le lastgelt en France; item touchant l'huile de baleines.

Le Sieur Nieupoort ambassadeur a envoyé une pinke expresse avec congé du regime en Angleterre, qui est tout à fait changé, le parlement estant cassé, estant fait un conseil de dix, qui gouverneront toute la republique, & de sept qui donneront les charges de la milice.

A.D. 1659. L'ambassadeur Nieupoort demande permission de venir icy rapporter de bouche, qu'il ne fauroit pas achever le traité de la marine; & que les Anglois ne veulent nullement le dresser, comme il faut.

Encore & derechef il y a eu rapport, debat, & dispute pour les 60,000 francs, qu'on devoit fournir au roy de Dennemarc. Le conseil d'estat ne le veut pas negotier.

Le 6. Novembre.

Il n'y a eu qu'un long rapport & receuil par le Sieur Crommon formé, touchant la cause entre la dame de Malsen & le regime de Cleves, ce qui a trotté long temps, en fin sera mis es mains des avocats de l'estat pour aviser.

Touchant la seigneurie de Deuren est derechef rapporté par le conseil d'estat.

De l'arrivement du Sieur Cojet est notification point de luy-même, qu'il ne vient qu'en qualité de député extraordinaire. Il est encore incognito à Amsterdam. Le Sieur agent de Glarges aura augmentation de gages de 1200 fl. par an, à quoy la Frise seule contredit encore.

Le 7. Novembre.

D'autant qu'on attend de jour à autre avec la flotte une grande quantité de matelots, & que l'argent pour payer leur solde pourroit n'estre pas si preste; l'on craint que (comme l'an 1652 durant la guerre d'Angleterre arrivoit à Amsterdam) que ces matelots estants d'ordinaire gens fort sauvages & farouches, ne facent quelque tumulte ou desordre à Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Horn, & Enchuysen. C'est pourquoy la Hollande a proposé de faire venir quelques compagnies en ces quatre villes; & par cette occasion la Zelande & Frise parlera aussy de Middelbergh & Harlingue.

Le college à Amsterdam aura avisé, qu'il faille confisquer le navire de Lubec, allant vers Stockholm, prins par le commandeur Cornelius Everets, & mené à Copenhagen.

L'on a proposé, que concedant Deurne au Sieur de Deurne l'on doive conceder Lysselt Albada. Mais iceluy à Albada estant papiste, on l'a improuvé.

Le Sieur Downing a notifié, qu'il est resolu de faire un voiage vers l'Angleterre, laissant sa femme icy; a requis un navire de guerre pour son transport: on luy a concedé un, qui est à la Breille.

To general Flectwood.

May it please your EXCELLENCY,

In the possession of the editor.

SOME, that are employed in civill and military affaires in this county of Mountgomery, have not received the least expres or account from any publique person since the dissolution or interruption of the late parliament, which hath put us to a stand as to our actings. I have been att a meetinge for the sequestration and the militia, and there was but one person to joine with mee. The commissioners of the militia (such as have neither troope nor company to be payd off) are loath to meddle in it, being themselves unconcerned. And the commissioners for sequestration being alsoe loath to raise moneyes, they knowe not for whom, nor to what end. The army heretofore declared their repentance for their former interruption, and that then they went out of the way. Wee know not but they may please to repent for this alsoe, or els the former repentance is to be repented off. In this county we are not soe used to the late parliament, but that if a more righteous settlement bee held forth, wee shall soone close with it; but will be loath to act by an implicit faith. I humbly desire, that you will encouradge the commissioners for the militia to act, that my troope may be payd off, and the other companies alsoe, if judged not usefull. Sir, the Lord guide you in this great affaire, and that you may call to your assistance such as have the spirit of wisedome and councill, and the feare of the Lord, and seeke not themselves; remembring, that your worke, as well as former structures, must some time abide the fiery tryall. We hang downe our heades here, bearing our shame, whilst the enemies triumph and rejoice, having nothing to answer, untill we have some good account from your excellency of the late transaction. We shall yet hope you intend well, and expect, that the Lord will doe us good in the latter end; soe humbly take leave,

Aberbechen in Mountgomery. ff.

A certi-

A certificate, whereby all the officers were new commissioned, to general Fleetwood.

ACCORDINGE to the resolve of the generall counsell of the armie the twenty-seventh A.D. 1659. of October, that all the officers of the armie should have ther commissions renewed without a new approbation; we doe therefore humbly desire, that your lordshipp would renew the commissions of all the commission-officers of the army according to the foresaid resolves. Given under our hands this twenty-ninth of October, 1659.

In the possession of the editor.

JOHN DISBROWE,
J. LAMBERT,
JA. BERRY.

The humble representation of colonel Morley, and some other late officers of the army, to general Fleetwood.

May it please your LORDSHIP,

AS we are Englishmen and Christians, as we have been imbarqued from the beginning of the wars, have borne our shares in the burden and heat of the day, are commissioned by the parliament, as other officers of the army are, and look upon ourselves and our families as concerned in the weal or the woe of the land of our nativity, we cannot neglect any means, that may prevent, or be parties to any thing, that may promote, the destruction of this poor nation. And therefore beholding with sad and bleeding hearts the late renewed breach made upon this parliament, the consequence whereof will be in more than probable conjecture, not only the rendering of all the blood and treasure shed and spent for the deliverance of poor England fruitless, but also the bringing of these nations into blood, destruction, and confusion, than which nothig can be more advantageous to Papists, and all bloody enemies to justice and true godliness; so that we cannot with just peace and satisfaction to our own consciences sit down altogether in silence. But as in some measure we do pour out our hearts before the Lord, so we think it our duty to present you with some of our serious thoughts, apprehensions, and fears; as also our desires, that you would consider in time before the Lord, what a flood-gate is opened for a deluge of miseries to be poured down upon this nation, and how much you are concerned, as you tender the honour of God, the vindication of religion, the credit of the gospel, the recovery of your own reputation, that now lies at stake, the just satisfaction, that all sober Christians and true Englishmen may challenge from you, and the relief of your native country, that is now sinking in her dearest concernments, and cries out for help, that you would (before it is too late) improve your utmost interest and power to put a stop to that destructive career, that the army now is engaged in, to obviate the too great advantages, that foreign and domestic enemies have now put into their hands, and seasonably to hinder those new councils, that have no parliamentary sanction, and so must be grievous to the freeborn people of England in any thing they do. We address ourselves to you, not only as being of eminent interest, but because you have professed religion and strictness of godliness at high rate, and much tenderness of spirit. Many sober Christians have had great hopes of you, and we are not without confidence ourselves; yet we know, that you are in a great temptation. The Lord grant, that your temptation may not be seconded with divine desertion: we are jealous over you: many are at a stand what to think of you: it was believed, that when English liberties were in late years so much infringed, that you did rather bewail them, than fully consent to what was done. Give us leave in faithfulness, and with breakings of heart, to tell you, that present actings do seem more transcendently to strike at the liberties of the English nation; and there is none now upon the stage of action, that can pretend to the same advantages, that the former protector had. Let not our hopes as to you be fruitless, nor our desires altogether rejected; if you will not hear the cries of the condition of this poor nation, the Lord will in his time; and believe it, there are thousands of precious souls in England, (whatever some may think of them) and will be found precious at the day of Christ's appearing, who are at this day weeping in secret places for the unwarrantableness of these late undertakings. And therefore let us speak but this once to you: Enter into your chamber, yea into the closet of your own heart, commune with your heart in the sight of that God, whose eyes are a flame of fire, and whose eye-lids try the children of men; and then labour to give England, Scotland, and Ireland, a thorough proof of your faithfulness, humility, self-denial, and public-spiritedness, by a timely retracting of late and unjustifiable actings, in violating that authority, whom we have all lately owned, and by whom we have lately been intrusted by commissions. The good people of this nation have been formerly deceived

A.D. 1659. deceived by good words and fair promises. Setting days apart for seeking of God in fasting, when the way is not good, will not hereafter blind English eyes: doing things unwarrantably, and then intitling God to them, as they will never the more be owned by God, so they will be never the more acceptable to discerning men. He that doth righteousness is righteous. The fear of the Lord is to depart from evil, and true godliness cannot be without denying one's self in all ungodliness and worldly lusts. They are just indeed, who have opportunity and power to be unjust, and yet dare not because of the fear of God: they are truly faithful, who, when they are tempted and provoked to be treacherous, yea and have opportunity and power so to do, yet will not, dare not wound their public trusts: they have the name of God written in their hearts, who stand in awe of his precepts, and dare do nothing merely because their sword is long enough to do it. And if this be according to the rule of truth, the question will be, Whether the late and present actings of so many officers of the army be suitable, yea or no? The parliament is interrupted, and that by a great part of the army. What parliament is it? Not the long parliament, under whose councils the army (by the blessing of God) hath won so many glorious battles in the field, both in England, Scotland, and Ireland: that parliament, which through the mercy of God, together with the subordinate concurrence of land and sea forces, was a terror to enemies both abroad and at home: that parliament, which was so constantly willing and ready both to satisfy public debts and contracted arrears, and to provide constant pay for the army and navy: that parliament, whose former interruption was found to be no ways advantageous to the nation. Have not the affairs of England both abroad and at home been declining ever since? And was not this army brought into such a perplexed condition by an over-ruling hand of providence, that it was forced to profess before God and man its sense of backslidings, and its duty to take shame to itself even for that force it had offered to this parliament? Did not this army acknowledge this parliament the only visible authority in this nation; and thereupon solemnly desire and invite them to the discharge of their remaining trusts, promising all faithfulness and assistance therein? Is it not to be considered, that this parliament, notwithstanding they could not but see, that they must sit again under great difficulties and disadvantages, because the treasure was exhausted, vast debts were contracted, and the soldiers and seamen unpaid; yet being invited, how did they break through those discouragements, and undertook difficillimam provinciam, who were no sooner assembled, but a general desperate and deep-laid plot stares them in the face, and in many places breaks forth upon them. And can it be denied, that the Lord was pleased in every part of the nation, where the plot broke forth, to take the honour of the success chiefly to himself? And we may truly say, that by grace we were outwardly saved, lest any man should boast. And can any be so injurious as not to acknowledge, that by the late sudden calming of the storm, God was pleased afresh to own, and that signally, the councils of this parliament? Yet this parliament must again be interrupted, and that by those, who had several ways solemnly engaged to them afresh. And in the late petition, how many times do the officers engaged therein seem to take a pleasure in styling of themselves, the faithful servants, and faithful army of this parliament? Yet now with what reality, we shall with grief of heart consider, and the world will judge, especially because already there are so many at work with tongue, yea some with pen, to bespatter the army's acknowledged masters, and so consequentially to bring parliaments out of credit, if possible, so as to beset people into a belief, that parliaments will not do the work. But the eyes of Englishmen are not so easily put out: we have not forgotten, that it was an old court design, not only to allure, but to affright Englishmen out of their love to (and their very discourse of) a parliament: yet there was a parliament at last, which found work enough for all the courtiers in the nation. We are not ignorant, how that there have been attempts of later date to wean this English nation from love unto their parliaments, and fair things have been promised, and some good things have been endeavoured to be done by another hand: yet there was still a necessity of calling parliaments; and when an intire house of commons would not do, a part thereof shall be made use of; and when a part thereof would not serve the turn, it also must take its turn to go off the stage; and when new parliaments seemed troublesome, the long parliament (styled by the army the famous long parliament); must be called again, which is not an obscure evidence, that the spirit of the free-born Englishmen (notwithstanding parliament interruptions, yet) is still working towards a parliament; and that old maxim will not be easily obliterated out of the table of English hearts, Quod omnes tangit, ab omnibus tractari debet. This English nation will be loth to lose their hereditary and birthright privilege of making their own laws, by which they shall be governed. We have had such experiences of our parliamentary state. Physicians, that have attempted in an uncouth way to heal the nation, and this with so little success, as that we (and we do believe, that there are many thousands of our mind) do know no help, under God, like that of a parliament. But now we are told, that as there is no authority in the nation, so all authority is devolved upon and resides in the army, that is, in the officers; and our government must be a sword-government, ment. And shall this be spoken by any, that shall presume to take the name of an holy A.D. 1659.

and just God into his mouth? Is England's dear-bought freedom come to this?

Our hearts would sink, but that we know the Lord doth reign; and if it were possible to prevent it, we would say, Tell it not in Gath, and let it not be published in the gates of Ashkalon, lest the daughters of the Philistines triumph. Have men been beheaded, banished, and slain in the field for doing things contrary to English laws? and shall this army bury English laws, and the legislature itself, all at once, and take all into their own hands? But no question some will say, there shall be just things. It is not the doing of some seeming righteous things, that will satisfy the just expectations and claims of this English nation, when they see, that all they have lies at the mercy of their fellow-servants. We have not forgotten what was once told the late king, and that by a parliament, that it is better to rule in the hearts of men by love and justice, than to rule over them by force and power. An arbitrary sword may tyrannize over mens persons and estates for a time; but it doth never conquer spirits. We would have hoped, that no part of this army, that professeth so much for Christ and his kingdom, would have ever so much as coasted upon the course of the Egyptian Mamalukes, or the Roman prætorian bands. But let men make sure of this, that what God did seem to wink at amongst ignorant Heathens, that were no better taught, he'll not so easily overlook, when acted by those, who should have better learned Christ; for Christ hath said it, that he, that takes the sword, shall perish with the sword; and for certain what was lately acted, and now acting, will come under the judgment of Christ, who is no respecter of persons, and before whom all the power and force of this world is as nothing, but as the drop of the bucket, and as the dust of the balance. We are not ignorant of the great argument, why this parliament was interrupted. What! must nine families be undone at once? Far be it from us to desire the undoing of any, much less of those, for whom we have so great respect; and we could heartily wish, that affairs might be composed to mutual satisfaction; and we are apt to fear, that all good men will (at the long-run) find the smart and inconvenience of these unhappy divisions. But what! are military commands so essential to the well-being of men, if not to their beings, that they shall count themselves undone, if their commissions be but vacated by parliament? If vacating of commissions be an undoing, how many hundreds of families have been undone, time after time, by the parliament's pleasure? Did not the parliament, in the year 1645, think fit to lay aside these general officers ensuing, namely, the earl of Essex, the earl of Warwick, the earl of Manchester, Ferdinando lord Fairfax, Sir William Waller, major-general Massey, Sir William Breerton, colonel Rossiter, and many other officers? Yea, how many commons have been vacated lately by the council of nominations? And the former have for many years sat down in silence and peaceably at home, who have been known in their time to have done as good service, and happily divers of them might be thought still to deserve a military trust, as well as some others. But let the utmost be granted, which cannot be imagined, that it were a kind of outward undoing, must the parliament be broken up? Must the only authority of the nation be trampled upon to prevent such an undoing? Nay more, must the saving of nine commons be of such weight in the balance of consideration, as that the undoing of so many millions of families in these nations shall be put to open hazard? But it may be presumed, that all will go well, because there is such a seeming compliance. We will remember, that general subscriptions, and often addresses, have, in very late experience, proved but a rotten prop or sandy foundation to some, who have either leaned or built too much upon them. We call to mind, that at first, that as the war was, so it was asserted to be, defensive on the parliament's part; and we do believe, that when we formerly, with such heat and activity, did persecute the cavaliers, as the declared enemy to English freedom asserted in parliament, and when we were in the days of our extremity amongst garments rolled in blood, and many times expecting our entrance into eternity by some instrument of death, that it was not then judged by any to be part of this good old cause to wrest all power and authority out of the hands of the people's representatives in parliament, and to fix it in an army. We have the rather taken upon us the liberty thus to express our moans unto your lordship relating to these affairs now in hand, because some of us were desired (which we took to be a command) to withdraw from the council of the officers, though we are commissioned officers by parliamentary authority, as well as others, and therefore we cannot willingly subscribe to the freedom of those debates, where . . . without any just allegation, are . . . or suspended; and then we did desire, that we might not be concluded by, or looked upon as parties to, any thing, that should be then concluded on. We are Englishmen born and bred, and have adventured our dearest blood, with others, for our freedoms; and, by the mercy of God, the common enemy could not withhold them from us. We shall not willingly, by any act of ours, give them away. If any of our fellow-servants will (because they can) by force take our freedoms from us, if we have no appeal on earth, yet our eyes shall be towards him, that judgeth righteously; and our prayers shall be, Lord, help us; for thou art the helper

A.D. 1659. of the oppressed. We have not much further to say to your lordship; but this we must lay before you, that in what you now do, you run three nations into a most desperate hazard; all lies at stake, all lies a bleeding. The question now is, whether it be not more honourable, upon a Christian account, and safe for you and others, to sound a seasonable retreat, than to march on in ways, which one day will not be justified before him, who is a consuming fire. The parliament of England never raised or maintained soldiers to be law-makers, but to defend this nation against those, who were law-breakers. Let not, oh let not any, who have any stirrings of conscience, justify that in their own practice, which they have fought down in others. Religion and the gospel should be, and we hope will be, dearer to us than our lives. Our liberties and estates in their places we must value. We know, that the Lord of heaven is he alone, upon whom (for the maintenance of these) we must chiefly depend; but according to human consideration, and as we are English freemen, and in this age have been beaten into the knowledge, where our English freedoms may be most safely lodged, so we must in all humility bear our testimony to you, that we know, nor can willingly own, no safer means for the recovering of all these than in the parliament. The people of England, assembled in parliament by their representatives, we must own to be our proper law-makers, and to have legislative power, and to have power legally to levy taxes upon the people. We must own it, that the militia and standing forces of England, Scotland and Ireland ought to be subordinate to, and to be disposed by, commands of parliament, and of such powers as are delegated by parliament; and therefore again it is the earnest desires of our hearts to your lordship, that you lay England's sad condition, and the interest of Christ in the world, to heart, and consider the hopes of all sorts of enemies by the late sad breach, and lay to heart the sighs, tears and groans of thousands of precious souls in this nation, as also the fears of many, that the glory is departing from our Israel; and also consider your own danger, and the danger of the army in the ways they now are; and that you would effectually endeavour the removing of the present force upon the parliament, that they may sit in safety, and without interruption; for this we judge (as the army not long since have done) the most likely expedient to make way for England's settlement; and therefore why should you not? It will be your honour, that by your means the door be once more opened, that this parliament may take some effectual course for as comprehensive an election of a succeeding parliament, as the safety of the cause will bear. And as to common enemies themselves, we can truly say, that we wish them equal benefit with ourselves under parliamentary laws. We only desire, that provision may be made, that the parliament and the well-affected of the nation may not be at their enemies mercy. In this our address to you, we have desired in faithfulness to bear our testimony; and when we have done, we must leave all to the disposal of him, that rules all the world, and lay it before your serious and retired consideration. We remain

A letter of intelligence.

MY LORD,

Hamburg, 1st Novemb. 1659.

Vol. lxvi.
p. 85.

MY last was eight days past; since which time no English letters are come here, which, I suppose, is occasioned through the troubles we hear are again in England. Letters of the 26th this day from Straelsund mention, that the confederates have lost two storms before Stetin, and three before Denim; and that Stetin was supplied with fresh forces; and that they had taken in the island Usden. The Brandenburgers burn down all about Straelsund, and are very tyrannical; insomuch that all the country people fly into the garisons. The Brandenburgers have made a bridge over the Elve; and the report goeth, they intend to quarter in the duke of Lunenburgh's country, who hath raised his whole country, and hath 3 or 4000 horse to oppose him. I received this day a letter from Sir Philip Meadowe from Nycoping of the 21st past. He writes, that as yet there was but little hope of a peace; but could not certainly say, what would be at last effected; for his majesty had not given his final resolution as yet. Letters of the 26th from the king's secretary mention, that there was great hope of a peace, and that it would be suddenly denly concluded. Schack is gone from Kiel, and hath embarked 2 or 3000 men: which way they are gone, is not known; some say for Funen, others for Schonen. A.D. 1659.

To Rosenwing.

MY LORD,

Hague, 11. Novemb. 1659. [N. S.]

UPON saturday last the commissioner Downing signified to the states, that he intended, upon this alteration, to make a voyage into England, for the dispatching of his own private affairs; as also to receive orders from the government, according to which he should regulate himself, presenting his service to their H. and M. L. who wished him a good voyage by the mouth of Monsr. Heyde, with this belief, that the government of England will continue to observe a good and firm amity with the state of the United Netherlands. Their H. and M. L. wrote to the admiralty of Amsterdam and Rotterdam for a ship of war for him to transport; but neither of them had one ready. They have since wrote to that of Zeland; but in the mean time there is an English convoyer come into the Maeze, in which he intends to return home.

Monsr. Coyer, extraordinary commissioner of the king of Sweden, arrived here yesterday morning, after that he had staid eight days at Amsterdam, having a train of sixteen persons, all in mourning for the death of the duke of Holstein. He is lodged in the French ordinary. His lordship gave captain Bankert, that brought him over, a present worth 400 rixdollars, being a chain and a medal; and to the seamen 300 rixdollars in money; which was done by order of the king his master. He hath not yet signified his arrival here, neither to the state, nor the Swedish public minister here, and will not demand audience till next week, and that for several reasons, but especially by reason, that the states of Holland will not be complete till then. There is now no more talk of denying him audience. I wish he had had audience, that so I might know, what his proposition is. I perceive they are resolved here to facilitate all that they can for the making of peace between the two Northern kings, as also for the removing of the jealousies and disgusts risen between this state and Sweden, which they will redress, by ratifying and perfecting of the treaty of Elbing. Men begin to say, the conventions made between the three states for the accommodating of the kings of Denmark and Sweden do begin to cease of themselves, in regard not only by reason, that the peace was not made in three weeks, according to the treaties, but likewise because they see, that France and England will not act upon those terms against Sweden, and that now the season of the year being past, there is no better way than to treat the ordinary way, and to further the peace by speedy means, although that the king of Sweden should persist to keep Cronenburg, which can be of no great use to Denmark, in regard Sweden hath the whole coast of Schoonen. These are the considerations, which men have about this work now; however, there be many, that imagine to themselves, that the king of Denmark will be forced to make a disadvantageous peace; and it is feared, that the endeavours used for the supplying the city of Copenhagen with all things necessary for this winter, will not be perfected, in regard that the one and the other is wanting at Amsterdam, and the moneys required for the same are not furnished. They doubt not here, but that the fleet, which departed from the Texel upon the 31st October, with provisions for the fleet and the militia in Denmark, is by this time arrived in the Sound.

They long to know here with great impatience the final declaration of the king of Sweden to a peace with Denmark; but which indeed will be nothing else but a delay.

The lord embassador Nieupoort will have his request granted him next week to come over for two or three months.

The lord lieutenant-admiral Opdam is looked for every day, with twenty-one ships.

An intercepted letter.

Sir EDWARD HYDE,

Good Mr. MILLS, and loving FREIND,

1st of Nov. 1659.

I RECEIVED not yours of the 26th, if sent, until the 28th of the last; but it was most welcome to me, as are all, that come from you, and any of my friends with you. I kindly thank you for your friendly care of my business in chancery, and desire you, that my answer to the bill put into that court against me, may be as full, and as warily drawn, as may be, and that there may be a dedimus potestatem sent over hither to some English merchants, how to take my answer. I can add little to the former directions I sent you concerning it; only I pray, let what is contained in the little note inclosed be fully expressed. I have gotten your countryman to put it into his cypher, which he hath with honest

Sir, The fear I apprehend of interception for this letter (wherein I send you a cypher) hinders me at present to write to you of any thing, other than to intreat you to send me a punctual account of the transactions of affairs there, the success of both the armies, with your own opinion of their settlement in the future. Send me Monck's declaration, with a list of the chiefest men, that stick to him, and of such towns, as he took, or declare for him, in England.

De Thou, the French ambassador in Holland, to Bordeaux, the French ambassador in England.

MY LORD,

Hague, 14. Nov. 1659. [N. S.]

Vol. lxvi.
p. 119.

THE reason, which hindered you to write to me by the foregoing post, hindered me likewise from performing my duty; and the more, in regard by the letters of the lord ambassador Nieupoort it appeared, that the mail was staid, which is not strange nor extraordinary in such-like revolutions and changes as this, whereof you were pleased to give me a relation, which doth fully set forth the same, and whereof the lord Nieupoort had given advice by an express; but his information was so lame and imperfect, that there was no comprehending of any thing. In short, my lord, we shall see what form of government this committee of safety will produce in six weeks time, which is allotted them, and what answer and course general Monck will give and take upon the propositions, which shall be made to him by the colonel, that is sent to him on the behalf of the army; as also what both sides declarations will produce. We desire also to know, if you treat with this committee of safety, since it doth appear by the establishment, that they have power to treat with the ministers of foreign princes; and before I leave Holland, I cannot omit to tell you, that I could not forbear to complain to Monsieur Downing of their news-book printed the 6th of this month, in which are two papers full of injustice against the papists, and against the pretended violences done in August last in those valleys of Piemont; and that he doth seem to insinuate, as it were, that our peace and alliance with Spain is done on purpose to make a quarrel about religion against the pretended reformed religion. Upon which he made answer, that in England, as in other states, there were some bigots in religion, who through indiscreet zeal caused things to be printed, which ought not to be.

As

As for the affairs of the north, I have had of late no news concerning them from Monsieur Terlon; but by letters from the ministers of this state, we understand, that from Nycoping in Falster, where he was gone to find the king of Sweden, he had writ to the lords commissioners of this state, and had sent them a pass to come to the said king, who appeared more disposed to a peace than formerly; and that the four commissioners were gone thither by sea, but a storm having forced them to quit the vessel, they went by land. Whereupon his majesty gave order to treat them nobly; and this, added to the sending of Monsieur Coyet, doth cause a belief, that there is some better disposition to a peace. The said lord Coyet arrived here yesterday from Amsterdam, and doth not prepare to have audience till monday next, by reason of some distemper of a cold, which he took at Amsterdam; so that his audience will be more numerous than ordinary, for that the states of Holland will be met at that time, who in this case have right to be in the assembly of the states general. He hath not taken the quality of ambassador, but only that of envoy extraordinary, so that he came here without ceremony. We know nothing in particular of the subject of his journey; Monsieur Terlon, as well as ministers of England, and likewise those of this state, having writ nothing of it.

As for Monsieur Rosewing, you judge of him very well, when you say, that he hath Spanish inclinations; and this is so true, that he can neither hide them or dissemble. The difference, which he had with Monsieur Chanut, was, that at his arrival he went to see the ambassador of Spain, and afterwards gave a visit to Monsieur Chanut, who mortified him only in not returning him the visit, and in letting of him know, that it was, because he had failed to render that duty to the king, which belonged to him; whereof he complained in the court of Denmark; for which he was blamed. For my part, I verily believe he is a pensioner of the house of Austria, and I would never have any thing to do with him. I write all this, that so you might know his good intentions.

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Le 8. Novembre, [1659. N. S.]

AYANT escrit vers Rotterdam, s'il y auroit un navire de guerre pour transporter le Vol. lxvi.
 Sieur Downing vers Angleterre, l'admirauté a rescrit, qu'ils n'ont nul; et celui luy P. 121.
 sera notifié par le Sieur agent de Heyde, et qu'on écrira aux admirautés d'Amsterdam et Zelande, de rescrire, s'il y a des navires, & y en ayant, qu'ils veuillent accommoder le Sieur Downing d'un navire de transport.

Le Sieur Downing aura cy-devant lasché des discours, que cest estat auroit prins des Anglois bien cent navires: le Sieur de R. a proposé, que cela est fabuleux, et qu'on devoit écrire de cela au regime même, ne suffisant point de l'écrire au Sieur Nieupoort, &c.
 mais cela est passé par un discours.

Le Sieur Cojet viendrait ce soir icy; mais sans notification, si qu'il viendra toujours incognito.

L'on dit, que le domdeeken de l'évesque de Munster soit icy: les députés de la ville sont attendus ce soir icy, ayants retardé à Amsterdam pour l'absence du Sieur Polf-brouck.

L'admirauté d'Amsterdam advise le reigle, que le Sieur Downing a redemandé, seroit de bonne prinse, ce que apparemment on suivra, par ce que le Sieur Downing est en desordre par le changement en Angleterre.

Le 10. Nov.

Le conseil d'estat n'est nullement porté à faire venir des compagnies des frontieres vers Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Hoornrett, Enchuyfen pour prevenir le danger du tumulte, qui pourroit estre causé par les matelots, revenants avec le Sieur d'Opdam: en cas que les colleges n'auroient pas tant d'argent contant, qu'il faudroit pour les payer. Ains si la Hollande desire des compagnies, elle pourra les prendre de Delf, Schiedams, Haye, Dort, & ailleurs, ou les compagnies ne sont pas tant nécessaires.

Le college d'Amsterdam a avisé sur la resolution du 3. Nov. touchant les deux navires de Lubec menés à Copenhagen, que les députés illec ont mal fait d'avoir relaxé l'un:
 et que tant pour l'un que pour l'autre il falloit & faut, que les navires soient menés icy, pour estre jugés par les admirautés.

Le conseil d'estat et la cour de Hollande, on decouvert, que le cipier de la porte icy et sa femme ont tenu intelligence avec les prisonniers, si que le cipier même est constitué prisonnier. Quis custodiet ipsos Custodes?

Le 11. Nov.

Le comte d'Oldenborgh ayant fait venir une tombe, ou monument pour estre dressé à sa memoire; cette tombe a esté retenu à Auntram, non obstant que ce ne fust par marchandise;

A.D. 1659. chandise; si que les estats generaux sur plainte faite de la part du comte ont escrit pour la relaxation.

Le Sieur Charisius par memoire a representé plaintes, qu' on ne resolu rien sur les memoires precedentes, qu' on retarde ce qui faut pour la conservation de Dennemarc; qu' on ne fournit pas les 60,000 fl. qu' on ne traité pas à luy fournir une notable somme contre bon gage et oppignoration, &c. Cela est mis en mains des commissaires.

Le consistoire à Finaert voulant disputer à la princesse de Hohenzoleern le jus patronatus, pretende de s' eslire un ministre à leur inclination; ce qui a causé la princesse à pleindre aux estats generaux; qu' en ont escrit à la classe de Dort, sous laquelle est l' eglise de Finaert, pour s' en informer et raporter icy.

L' admirauté d' Amsterdam, de même comme Rotterdam, s' est excusé de donner un navire pour le transport du Sieur Downing. Tempora si fuerint nubila, solus eris.

Aujourd'huy en fin est disposé des 4 seigneuries de Deurne, Berlicom, Middelro, et Risoir, avec exclusion d' Albade, et contre la protestation de Frise.

Le 12. Novembre.

Le comte de Berge a derechef fait urger son affaire & execution contre son beaufrere. Il y a eu plainte touchant deux du Frانس prisonniers à Bruge. Il y a eu nouvelle alteration touchant la vendition des seigneuries dans la Mayerie et Boileduc.

Ceux du Frise ont obtenu le delogement d' une de leur compagnies estant à Zwooll, pour la transporter vers Harlingh.

Il y a eu queste pour savoir l' auteur d' une livre nommé Apostasie of a feal des Cbri-sienes, tenant du Socinianisme.

Le 13. Novembre.

Il y a eu advis, que l' amiral Opdam seroit sur les costes icy: le Sieur Cojet est venu à ce matin.

Les deputés de Munster ayant demandé audience, l' auront demain: par memoire a esté requis pour relaxation aussy du navire de Michel Suke de Lubec, mené à Copenhagen; sur quoy est resolu, que le memoire soit mis en main des commissaires de la part marine.

D' Angleterre ne sont encore venu nulles lettres à l' estat. Par quelque galiot sera venu que le milice a constitué un conseil, qui regira tout; cependant demeurerent encore fermées routes les havres.

Le service maistre et receveur de Bergh op Zoom, tel nommé de Witte, sera aussy calangé par le magistrat d' icelle ville, d' avoir malversé dans sa recepte, estant venu icy pour se justifier.

Le 14. Novembre.

Le sindic de Munster a harangué dans les estats generaux, dont la subsistence a consisté en 3 chefs. 1. A remercié pour l' assistance faite l' an 1657, et pour tant d' autres faveurs et courtoisies. 2. Il a requis et supplié la mediation de cest estat, pour accommoder le differents, que la villea avec l' evesque en representant les iniquités et les injustes procedures. 3. Que cependant pour asseurer la ville il plaise envoyer pour garnison pour un à 600 hommes à pied, et 4 compagnies de cavallerie, au fraiz de l' alliance Hanseatique, c' est à-dire, de cest estat; sur quoy luy est respondu par compliments, tel qu' on examinera la proposition.

RECEIVED a letter from the lord bishop of Munster, dated at Coesholt the 31st of October last, concerning the differences depending between him and the city of Munster. Whereupon being debated, it is thought good and resolved, that the said letter, with the inclosed propositions, which the lords commissioners sent by the said city did make in their H. and M. L. assembly upon the 14th instant, and afterwards delivered in writing by them, shall be given to the lords Ommeren and other their H. and M. L. commissioners for the affairs of Munster, to be by them perused and examined, and to make report of the whole.

A letter of intelligence.

S I R,

A.D. 1659.

Vol. lxvi.
p. 107.

I PRAY be pleased to excuse me for not writing by the last post. The cause of it partly was, because I was removing from the English house into another lodging; and besides, at the same time there was but little news stirring worthy your knowledge. We are here very perplexed of the new troubles and distractions in England. We have had no letters from thence not in three weeks. Just now we hear the post is come in; but the letters are not out yet. It is highly to be pitied, that the English nation cannot be settled, and that so many changes so soon after another are happened. As for our news from these parts, we have, by letters from Copenhagen of the 3d current, that the Danes have landed their forces in Funen at Ratkemunde, where the Swedes did oppose; but the Danish and Hollandish forces did prevail. The Swedes have had considerable forces in the said island, above 4000 men, and made all preparations to defend the said island; but the Danes were too strong for them. The Hollander is joined with the Dane in this design, and had a hand in taking the said island; but whether the whole island be taken or not, we can hear no certainty. It is said, the Swedes are retired in Newberg, a strong town in the said island, and defend it yet. Langeland, another island, the Swedes have left. By the said letters of Copenhagen of the 3d current, we hear, that the treaty at Nycoping in Falster is dissolved; and that the king of Sweden did break off the said treaty, and absented himself, when he heard, that the Hollanders had acted hostility against him, in joining with the Danish fleet to attack Funen. Yet some letters mention the contrary, as if the ambassadors were returned from Falster to Copenhagen, and that the Swedish commissioners were gone along with them to treat further; which is more certain than the other news. The king of Sweden hath declared himself to render Cronenburg and Naskau, but upon condition, that the peace of Roschild be observed in all the articles and clauses; which at last the king of Denmark will be glad to accept. And there are more hopes of peace than ever before, because the Swedes will quit Cronenburg and Naskau. The letters from Stetin and Straelsund were not arrived yet; but by the last post we have, that Stetin holds out stoutly; and that the general Wrangell was arrived at Stetin with relief for them; and it is said, the Imperialists will be forced to leave the siege before the said town. By letters from Prussia we have, that the Poles with their siege before Marieburg can effect nothing; neither have they taken the Danzicker Hooft. This is all at present from Hamburg, the 8th November, [1659.]

Your humble servant,

DE LAWERIN.

Even just as I was closing this letter, I have received three of your letters, with the printed news of three posts; for which I give you many thanks, and long much to hear, what frame of government they will pitch upon. Some here expect soon another protector; but it is to be feared it will not last very long. There are no hopes of any establishment in the government, but manum de tabula.

A letter of intelligence.

My LORD,

Hamburg, 8th Nov. 1659. [N. S.]

FOR news, we have here written from Lubec and Kiel, that the Danes and Brandenburgers, which went from thence, are landed in Funen; and that the Swedes were retreated to Newberg. The prince of Sultzbach, major-general Arenson, and Balteger, are there, with 2 or 3000 brave men. What the success of it will be, we long to hear. Letters of the 3d from Copenhagen bring, that our and the French ambassadors were arrived there, and that the Holland's were expected there that day; and that the treaty had been in a good forwardness; but as soon as the king heard, that the fleet was gone from Kiel, went away from Falster immediately to Zeland again, and left the ambassadors there; so it is thought nothing will come of the treaty. No news from Prussia. The Hooft holds out still. No letters come from Straelsund. They write from Tabing, that the French are marched into Elfas with 24 regiments, to make a diversion to the emperor.

Resolu-

Resolution of the states general.

A.D. 1659.

Vol. lxvi.
p. 129.

Martis, the 18th of Nov. 1659. [N. S.]

AFTER deliberation had, it was resolved, that, in pursuance of their H. and M. L. resolutions of the 12th of September and 14th October, both last past, as well by the lord embassador Boreel, as by offices to be used by the lords Van Gent and others their H. and M. L. foregoing commissioners with the lord embassador de Thou, the king and court of France, by virtue of the fourth article of the treaty concluded upon the 21st of May last here in the Hague, shall be once more summoned to forbear giving all manner of help and assistance to the king of Sweden, either by lending of moneys, subsidies, or otherwise. And that likewise the government of England, by the lord embassador Nieupoort, as well upon the said fourth article, as also upon the further conventions of the 24th July, and the . . . of August last, shall be also summoned to recal in the first place, and especially, the English regiments, as also all particular officers, soldiers and seamen, of the English, Scotch, or Irish nation, being in the service of the king of Sweden, either by sea or land; and to that end to give order for the effecting of the same, by publishing an act accordingly. And likewise to command all their admirals, vice-admirals, commanders and captains at sea, as also all governors and commanders of their sea-ports, to seize, bring in and detain all Swedish ships, wheresoever they can meet with them, as their H. and M. L. have done on their side for as much as concerneth this second point. And what concerneth the first, they are resolved to publish an act for that purpose. The said lords embassadors are to give an account to their H. and M. L. from time to time, of their proceedings herein; for their H. and M. L. do take this business very much to heart.

A resolution of the lords the states general.

Martis, 18th Nov. 1659. [N. S.]

Vol. lxvi.
p. 131.

UPON what was presented by the lord treasurer general the lord Beverning, concerning the paying of freight for 600 chaldron of Newcastle coals bought by the lord embassador Nieupoort in England, amounting to the sum of 3600 rixdollars, or 9000 gilders, after deliberation had, it is resolved, that the council of state do forthwith pay the said sum out of the revenue of the generality into the hands of the lords burgomasters of Amsterdam, who are herewith desired to remit the same for Copenhagen, to pay the said freight there.

The states general of the United Netherlands to Nicupoort, their embassador in England.

MY LORD,

Vol. lxvi.
p. 133.

WE send you here inclosed a copy of our placarts, to serve for your information, and where it doth belong; whereby we order all officers, captains, seamen, and soldiers, natives and subjects of the United Netherland Provinces, that are at present in the service of the king of Sweden, to return home, and leave his service, within the space of three months, upon the forfeiture of life and estate, where any shall be found to act to the contrary.

By order of the states,

RUYSCH.

An intercepted letter.

MY LORD,

Vol. lxvi.
p. 111.

THAT their H. and M. L. should also at last go from their resolution taken concerning the Hague treaty, I did always certainly believe, and especially under this specious pretence and excuse, that in regard France and England did not concur with them therein, they had also reason to let go the same. As these here, who have the most power, do play with their masters, making no reflection upon any thing, just so do their H. and M. L. with their allies.

It is no otherwise here than it is elsewhere, where there is no head: all the privileges of this city are, for the most part, infringed; and all assemblies and meetings are forbidden by

by the committee of safety *. They begin to talk here now of an accommodation between A.D. 1659. general Monck and his army; and to that end commissioners are sent by the said general Monck. But suppose these two should agree with one another, yet I see little hopes of a peace, so long as the army commandeth; and to cashier the same is much less hope.

No government can continue long here, that will in any-ways touch the authority of the army.

London, 10th Nov. 1659.

To Rosenwing.

SIR,

Hague, the 21st of Nov. 1659. [N. S.]

AFTER I had sent my last of the 14th instant to you, the lieutenant admiral Van Wassenaer Vol. lxvi. arrived here, and made report the next day in their H. and M. L. assembly, after he P. 139. had delivered the letter of the king of Denmark, having been a year in Denmark in the east-sea, and about those parts, bringing with him twenty-one ships of war, and the next month twenty ships more are expected. He said, that he must confess, that this last summer some good might have been done for the king and kingdom of Denmark, if so be their H. and M. L. had not been pleased to send him so many contrary orders, signifying likewise to the state, that his majesty of Denmark had sent him a present of 30,000 gilders or money-worth, and had gratified his son with a yearly pension during life of 3000 gilders; but did not accept of it without having first the approbation of their H. and M. L. His excellency was only told by the lord Van Gent, who was president of the assembly, that his arrival in pursuance of the order of the state was acceptable to their H. and M. L. and that likewise his journal with the instructions and orders of their H. and M. L. sent him from time to time, should be examined, having not yet received thanks from the states, as the custom is. Whether there will be proceeded in those charges, which have been formerly given in against him, we shall soon see; but it is believed all will be accommodated. His excellency made likewise the day before yesterday his report to the states of Holland, who have been completely assembled since that time, and begin to debate about the affairs of the east, and what ought to be taken in hand to bring the king of Sweden to an accommodation with Denmark.

The lord Coyet, extraordinary commissioner from the king of Sweden, signified upon the 15th instant to their H. and M. L. his arrival, adding withal, that by reason of his indisposition he could not present himself in person to their H. and M. L. and as yet he hath had no audience of their lordships, being still indisposed, so that it is not known, when he will demand audience. It is said he intends to make his a proposition as moderate as is well possible, thereby to make an impression upon their minds here, and the better to insinuate himself; but I conceive he will not be able to do any good upon them that way, his devices being already too well known here. In the mean time they publish here on the Swedes side, that their king is inclined to make a peace with Denmark upon the terms of the Roschild treaty, provided that one of the mediators, or rather all, that are with the king of Sweden, do give assurance, that the same shall be observed. The lords of the province of Holland and of others do yet shew themselves very much animated against the Swedes, and say, that they will propose to the lord Coyet the conventions made between the three states for a peace in the eastern parts.

There is also an order sent to the lord ambassador Nieupoort, who is ordered to summon once more the government in England, according to the conventions, to withdraw in effect from the Swedes all the English ships and Irishmen, that are in the service of the king of Sweden, and to seize upon all Swedish ships, as is already done by this state.

The lord ambassador of France is to be desired to morrow by the lords de Gent, and other commissioners of their H. and M. L. to use endeavours by the king and his ministers, to the end, that all help and assistance to the king of Sweden, either by lending of money, subsidies, or otherwise, may be forborn, according to the 4th article of the convention of the 21st of May last; but I believe there is little good to be expected from the French side, for they are of another resolution in the French court, than they imagine here. The fleet of merchantmen designed for Copenhagen with provisions is to be convoyed by two ships of war, and is ready to set sail.

A.D. 1659.

Vol. lxvi.

p. 137.

L'ADMIRAL Opdam à esté dans l'assemblée, delivrant credentielle de S. M. de Dennemarque ; et apres quelque rapport sommier, a dit, que sa dite majesté luy avoit fait present de trente mille francs, et son fils une pension annuelle de trois mille francs sa vie durant ;
mais qu'il n'avoit osé ny voulu accepter sans permission de l'estat ; sur quoy estant deliberé, Messieurs de Hollande l'ont transfumé, et discours particulier a esté tenu sur cela, que ce pourroient bien estre les soixante mille francs, qui ont esté tant pressé icy par le Sieur Vogel-fanck et le sieur Charisius. Le sieur president a respondu au Sieur d'Opdam simplement, que le retour de sa personne en bonheur et santé estoit agréable, et qu'on requiroit son journal et rapport par escrit, pour l'examiner ; et à la plus part à semblable cette soupe de soixante mille francs trop grasse.

Le Sieur Cojet a notifié au sieur president de l'assemblée, qu'il estoit arrivé icy, est qu' estant indisposé, il esperoit neantmoins au commencement de la semaine future de requerir audience.

L'on n'a pas resolu de luy envoyer aucun pour congratuler. Voire fust dit par ceux de Zelande, comme les nostres n'ont osé ny peu venir auprès de son roy, qu'en demandant permission et pasport, que de même il eust demander semblable permission et pasport, devant que venir icy.

Le sieur ministre d'Espagne a requis libre pasport pour les meubles de Don Juan.

Les deputés de Nycoping du 4 9bre ont escrit d'avoir fait leur proposition publique et en particulier pour induire le roy au traité du 21. May, &c. et qu'ils y estoient fort bien traité comme ceux de France et Angleterre, en attendant la resolution du roy.

Le Ruyter escrit, que les troupes sont embarquées un peu contre cœur, et aussy pas tout.

Lundy, le 17. dito.

Il y aura eu une lettre de l'evesque de Munster en Latin ; qui fait grande plainte des deputés de Munster ; les accuse de crime de lèse majesté ; et dehorte cest estat de l'assistance qu'on pourroit avoir intention de donner à la ville, ou bien, si cest estat voudroit assister une mauvaise cause, que le sieur evesque tascheroit aussy sub quovis clypeo de main-tenir son bonne cause.

Du sieur Vogelfancke a esté une lettre particuliere, contenant qu'il avoit donné sa caution pour certains onze mille francs, dont le roy avoit grandement besoin. Il dit que dans peu il auroit derechef besoin de certaine somme ; pour laquelle somme on le sollicitoit aussy ; mais qu'il s'en excuseroit.

Le sieur ministre d'Espagne aura derechef fait plainte par memoire touchant le pais d'Outre-meuse ; sur quoy dans peu il y aura une conference.

L'affaire du marbre, que le comte d'Oldenborgh a fait venir de Cologne pour sa tombe, a esté sur le tapis ; pour exemption de licentes estant arresté à Aernem, l'on a bien ordonné à l'admirauté de les affranchir ; mais l'admirauté declare d'avoir besoin de son revenu en ce temps fascheux. L'on croit, que la Hollande en leur particulier le fera.

Mardy, le 18. dito.

Comme hier a esté la lettre de l'evesque de Munster, ainisy aujourd'huy le sieur resident Friquet de la part de S. M. Imperiale a fait livrer aux estats generaux un memoire, par le-quel il represente le tort, que la ville de Munster a, et dehortant cest estat de l'affaire, et ne s'en mesler point.

Cela est de même mis en mains du Sieur Ommeren et autres pour examiner, &c. L'assemblée a derechef esté occupée par les sommes d'argent, que la Dennemarc requiert ; et choses qui concernent cela.

Il y a quelque avis preliminaire de comment la paix seroit conclue entre les deux roys du nort, avecque exclusion de l'empereur et Brandeborgh. Mais ny de Copenhagen ny de Falster n'est rien venu, ny du haut quartier de l'electeur de Brandeborgh.

Mecredy, le 19. dito.

Du Sieur ministre d'Espagne il y aura esté une nouvelle plainte contre la sentence donnée par le conseil d'estat contre ceux de Slypendam en Flandre, desirant surseance, &c.

Le dit conseil a esté dans l'assemblée des estats generaux, pour en fin trouver les 60 mille frans pour le roy de Dennemarc : enquoy en fin on est tombé d'accord, de quoy on le prendra ; et à cela seront entre autrés appliques les gages des 60 officiers envoyés l'hyver passé en Norwage, et cela sera remplacé de tels subsidies des provinces.

De l'audience du Sieur Cojet point de nouvelle encore, si qu'il attendra apparemment l'issue du traité à Nycoping, et du dessein au Funen. Et en un mot, il fera la guerre à l'œil, & succenturiat d'Appelboom.

L'on

Jeudy, le 20. dito. A.D. 1659.

L'on a derechef resolu de faire office par le sieur de Gent, et autres pres l'ambassadeur de Thou et par l'ambassadeur Boreel en France, et par le sieur ambassadeur Nyport en Angleterre, à ce que le roy de France ny la republique d'Angleterre ne veuillent pas plus assister le roy de Suede ny par argent, ny par navires, ny par hommes, à fin de l'obliger tant plus et mieux à la paix.

Il y a eu advis de l'admirauté de Zelande touchant le navire de Lubec mené à Copenhagen, desirant que le dit navire soit mené en ce pais-cy pour estre jugé par l'admirauté ou ressort le capitaine qu'il a prins.

Il y a esté rapport du Sieur Ommeren et autres ayant examiné l'affaire de Lith, rapportant que lit est sous la Meyerie, sur quoy est trouvé bon d'ouir les raisons du sieur Schil envoyé de l'electeur de Coloigne, soustenant que cela est de l'evesché de Liege.

Les deputés de Munster auront demain audience dans l'assemblée de Hollande.

Vendredy, le 21. dito.

Le sieur Cojet en fin a fait presenter sa lettre de creance, qui est couchée en termes de civilité. Il a fait dire de requerir audience pour demain, si sa disposition le permettoit. En quoy s'usera la façon cy-devant pratiquée, ayant la qualité d'ablegatus, comme autrefois le sieur Cantersteyn.

Le sieur de Gent aura proposé à cause des troubles et executions, que fait le droffard Woouter vander Meer au pais de Outre-meuse, que l'on fourniroit à Perster l'argent pour satisfaire à vander Meer, à fin de demeurer cependant en possession.

L'on aura arresté un placard avocatoir pour retirer tous matelots du service de Suede, qui sont natifs d'icy.

Le sieur Boreel escrit de la mort subite du prince d'Espagne: le sieur Reede n'en fait nulle mention.

Le sieur Boreel demande aussy permission de venir icy vers pasque, pour enterrer le corps de sa femme.

Nicupoort, the Dutch ambassador in England, to De Witt.

MY LORD,

SINCE my last of the 14th instant I have received yours of the 7th, and last night that of the same date. By the next I hope to understand, that the government hath given me leave to return home; in regard, I perceive, with great joy in both your last letters, that you do promise to second my instant request. I hope there will be a ship sent over hither to transport me, which shall not be expressly obliged to any convoy, that so I may order my departure the better for the service of the state.

A person of quality signified to me to-day, that the three commissioners of Monck sent out of Scotland were arrived here privately *, and that there was no doubt to be made of the accommodation, especially now, that the city of London will not engage in the quarrel, but doth promise to help to prevent and quell all commotions and disturbances: that the fleet, and also Ireland, do conform themselves to the army here; and that there is nobody in England, that dares oppose it, but in words and pasquils. Mr. Downing hath assured me, that he will contribute all good offices for the confirming of the amity between both states; but I find generally their words better here than their effects; yet many judicious men judge, that for both there can be nothing more necessary thought on, than a real and sincere amity. I thank your lordship for the care you take for the payment of the freight of the coals at Copenhagen at their arrival there. But in regard of the troubles about Newcastle, and that the season of the year is so far spent, the merchants could get no ships to their minds; but now they have assured me, that there be some that lie ready. To-morrow I will speak with them, and hasten them to send them away. I am informed, that the lords plenipotentiaries are sent for home. When the form of government is agreed on and established, I hope I shall be better able to penetrate into affairs, and give a more certain account, what course they intend to steer here, as to the affairs of the north. The merchants here do very much desire a peace with Spain, and are possessed with extraordinary malice against the United Netherlands; but when it pleaseth God, it is better to be envied than pitied. I hope God will direct all things for the good of our state.

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Lundy, le 24. Novembre, 1659. [N. S.]

A.D. 1659.
Vol. lxvi.
P. 143.

LE Sieur Charisius, resident de S. M. de Dannemarc, a requis exportation d'ammunition de guerre pour Luckstadt, ce qui est accordé en payant les convoys et licentes. En fin le Sieur Cojet a requis audience pour demain, et pour sa conduite sont nommés le Sieur de Gent et Ripperse.

Les députés de Munster ont eu audience aussy dans les estats de Hollande, qui ont nommé les villes de Dorth, Haerlem, Amsterdam, Alckmar, Horn.

La Hollande est en nouvelle conference touchant une bonne somme, que le roy Poloigne desire luy estre prestée sur son peage à Luckstadt.

Mardy, le 25. dito.

Notification est venu, que le comte Mirande, ambassadeur, de Portugal, seroit arrivé à Rotterdam ; pour la reception duquel est donné ordre au maistre d'hostel Hefels.

Le Sieur ministre d'Espagne aura esté en conference sur les affaires d'Outre-meuse, luy estant proposé un interim et accommodement, que cest estat en osterá les 300 hommes, qui y logent ; et on fera avoir aux Espagnols, ce que leur vient de Beden ; et autre chose, ce que le Sieur ministre auroit accepté.

Une lettre des estats de Frise aura esté leue dans les estats generaux en faveur de la ville de Munster dans icelle ; la Frise declare asses clairement, qu'elle aidera vigoreusement la dite ville, en cas que par mediation on effectue rien. De cela est prins copie pour les provinces.

Le Sieur Cojet a fait une proposition en Latin : aura discouru du passé, aura offert ad-justment touchant tout, specialement sur le traité d'Elbing. Il a demandé commissaires ; qu' on luy a donné. Que le bagage des ambassadeurs en Zelande seroient pillés, est abus.

Mecredy, le 26. dito.

Le sindic de Munster a présenté un long memoire en Haut-Allemand contre celui du Sieur ministre Imperial ; lequel, pour estre Allemand, a esté baillé pour estre translaté ; et puis sera aussy mis en mains des membres députés de Hollande, qui aujourd'huy ont eu une conference dessus les affaires de Munster, mais sans faire rapport encore. Cependant la ville d'Amsterdam est portée à un accommodement.

Sur la proposition du Sieur Cojet sera conference demain, non pas avec luy-meme, comme il a requis, mais pour concevoir une responce à donner sur sa proposition ; dans lequel concept responce l'on luy demonstrera à l'œil, qu'il a tort, et que cest estat a raison.

Ceux d'Amsterdam demeurent encore en leur dessein de exiger raison du Sieur d'Opdam de le qui est passé au Sont, ayant fait examiner et faissant encore examiner des capitaines, qui ont esté au combat.

Les admirautés sollicitent de l'argent pres de ceux de Hollande.

Jeudy, le 27. dito.

Ceux de Frise ont fait lire leur resolution ; par laquelle ils lient et limitent leurs consentes ou subsides pour Dannemarc à la cause ou protection de Munster. Si que leur resolution est bein plus vigoureuse que non pas la lettre escrite aux estats generaux, qui ne parle que de la mediation.

Les autres provinces ont trouvé cela fort estrange ; veu que le danger de Dannemarc est trop pressant, et trop passent. Voila pourquoy est resolu d'escire aux estats de Frise à fin de les disposer autrement ; et toutefois que les autres provinces donnent aussy à connoistre leur bonne inclination.

Pour la reception du comte Miranda sont nommés les Sieurs Crommon et de Renswoude, au pont du Hornbrugge ; mais il n'est pas encore prest avenir.

L'on festonne pourquoy icy l'ambassadeur de France ne fait pas encore nulle notification de la paix.

Quant à la conference sur la proposition du Sieur Cojet, n'est rien fait encore, et cela viendra premierement de Hollande.

Vendredy, le 28. Novembre.

Le Sieur resident Charisius a par memoire recommandé l'expedition du second convoy de vivres et necessités requis pour Dannemarc.

Le resident Cojet a fait plainte par un memoire expres de ce, que hier l'on a prononcé sur une affaire litigieuse entre la dame de Malsen contre le regime de Cleve, touchant des contributions, que ce regime electoral de Cleve a prins au prejudice des habitants de cest estat ; mais sur cela n'est encore rien fait.

Sur un memoire touchant une navire de Lubec, est resolu de voire le retroactes.

L'admirauté

L'admirauté d'Amsterdam aourny à Messieurs de la ville d'Amsterdam des attestations de caption, au prejudice du Sieur d'Opdam.
Sur la proposition du Sieur Cojet n'est encore rien fait; ains on attend ce qu'apporteront les nouvelles de ce soir; mais la responce ne manquera pas.

BY order of the council dated Jan. 20, 1658. it appears, that Mr. secretary Thurloe past an account of moneys received, and disbursed by him upon the business of intelligence and other services, amounting to 2410 l. between the 1st of May, 1657. and the 15th of the said January, whereof he was acquitted.

That by an account of disbursements for the like services between the said 20th of January to the 29th of September last, it appears, that Mr. secretary has farther disbursed the sum of 1979 l. 15 s. 4 d. whereof he hath received, as by certificate from Mr. Frost, produced by Mr. secretary the 17th of November, 1659. appears,

Memorand. that in the said account there is one sum of 300 l. for which no acquittance is produced, the money not being paid yet; but which he stands engaged to pay for the said service; also one sum of 2 l. another of 6 l. and a third of 60 l. for which no acquittances are produced, the last of them paid by his own hands.

Also here are eight sums included in this account, amounting in the whole to 92 l. paid to several persons at several times before the commencement of this account being omitted in the former, and allowed in January last, the moneys being by his directions paid by Mr. Nuttley, and not brought to account to Mr. secretary, till the said account was past.

Mr. secretary demands allowance of 387 l. 7 s. 4 d. as so much lost to him by the reason of the late insurrection of Sir George Booth, as by certificate from four clerks of the office; which demand is grounded upon a clause in the letters patents, upon which there is the increase of 4000 l. rent per ann. whereby it is provided, that if the said increased rents cannot be raised by reason of war intestine or foreign, the decay of trade, &c. then the commissioners of the treasury are directed to make a proportionable abatement of the said rent according to equity, as the case shall require. He likewise demands allowance of 602 l. 6 s. 4 d. for the postage of the letters of the members of parliament between the 5th of February, 1658. and the 13th of April, 1659. as also of 344 l. 8 s. 9 d. for like letters of members of parliament between the 7th of May, 1659. and 29th of September last, as by certificate of the clerks of the office, he being not obliged to carry any other letters free than what are in his letters patents particularly mentioned, the letters of members of parliament not being included therein.

Memorand. The letters patents are grounded upon an act of parliament in 1636. whereby the office of post of letters both inland and foreign was settled in the state for ever, and power granted to the protector to let it for eleven years at such rent as he should judge reasonable.

A paper of the Dutch ambassador in England.

Vol. lxvi.
p. 151.

THE subscribed ambassador of the lords the states general of the United Netherlands findeth himself obliged by express orders of the said lords his superiors to represent to the present government of the commonwealth of England, that their extraordinary deputies to the kings of Sweden and Denmark have neither directly nor indirectly committed, nor omitted, nor refused any thing on their side contrary to the contents and the true meaning of the respective agreements made and concluded at the Hague on the 21st of May, the 24th of July, and the 4th of August last past, and especially not in that particular alledged by the late general, and one of the plenipotentiaries of this commonwealth the lord Edward Montagu, to excuse the unreasonable withdrawing and sailing away with the English navy out of the Sound. For they have been ready and willing (according to the second article of the said agreement, bearing date the 4th of August aforesaid) to join a considerable number of ships of war of the fleets in the immediate service of the said United Netherlands; and withal, that the same might, without loss of time or procrastination, act, and effectually procure, that the detractor or detractors of the peace so much desired might re ipsa be compelled to admit the same on the conditions, which have been expressed in writing on the 24th day of July aforesaid. The said extraordinary court have also declared themselves sufficient, how to re-establish the said peace in the speediest, safest, and most efficacious manner without any loss of time; and have not pretended at all to expect or to desire any new order or direction from the lords their superiors, so that the detriment and inconveniencies, which are unfortunately happened since, by reason that the said peace hath not been established in the summer season, can no ways be imputed unto A.D. 1659. him. It is true, that they desired to deliberate, and to consult with the right honourable the plenipotentiaries of England, what number or part of the fleets and militia, as well of England as of the United Netherlands, should a little after return homewards, leaving there so much as would be sufficient to bring things to an happy issue, according to the agreement of the 24th of July aforesaid; which was expressly so stipulated and agreed at the Hague, as appeareth by the last article of the said agreement signed and concluded on the 4th day of August aforesaid; and in pursuance thereof, after a deliberation and consultation with the before-mentioned plenipotentiaries of England, they have written to the said lords their superiors, desiring their special direction and order, what ships of the United Netherlands should return, and in what harbours; which was not against any agreement at all, but very just and reasonable, it being notorious, that it was not the withdrawing of ships, but the conjunction of forces, that would be conducing to the establishment of peace; and the clause in the second article of the treaty concluded on the 4th of August, 1659. aforesaid, mentioning, that no new orders should be expected from their respective principals, is only relative to the matters contained in the same article, and not at all to the third article, which being posterior doth follow, and which doth dictate only, that the respective public ministers of England, and the United Netherlands, should deliberate and consult, &c. And it appears by the treaty or article agreed on at the Hague aforesaid on the 12th day of September last past with the public minister of England residing there, that it was not at all contrary, but according to the said treaties and agreements concluded at the Hague aforesaid, that it should be done in such a manner.

The said subscribed ambassador findeth himself further obliged to represent to the present government, that by the said agreement of the 21st of May aforesaid the commonwealth of England, as well as the state of the United Netherlands, are both bound to desist from giving any aid or assistance whatsoever to him, who should refuse to make peace upon just and reasonable conditions, and that for as long as he should continue in that resolution of refusing peace. And both England and the United Netherlands have further obliged themselves, by the agreement concluded at the Hague aforesaid on the 24th of July aforesaid, as appears manifestly by the last article of the same treaty or agreement, that after the expiration of the fifteen days therein mentioned, neither the English nor the Netherlandish fleet or militia should be permitted to assist or give any aid or countenance any wise, either or both the parties, who, after that the said fifteen days should be elapsed, should not admit the conditions of the peace mentioned in the foregoing articles of the said agreement; but that to the party, who should consent thereunto, all aid and assistance should be given; and that it should be endeavoured by joint arms and forces effectually to compel the detractor to admit of the peace so much desired on the conditions before-mentioned.

In pursuance of which respective agreements addrestes have been made by the respective public ministers to the kings of Sweden and Denmark. What delays and subterfuges have been practised by the first-named king, before the said public ministers were admitted to audience, and how they were dealt withal, when they had propounded the conditions of the so much desired peace, according to the said agreements, is so public, it being done before so many courtiers and officers of the king of Sweden, that it is needless to repeat it. But the king of Denmark did entertain the before-mentioned public ministers with all respect and civility, and did not only by word of mouth assure them of his good inclination to the re-establishing of the peace; but declared it in writing, and gave it under his hand and seal on the 25th day of August last past: that on a more diligent consideration on the matters which had been propounded both by word of mouth, and writing by the Lord, the mediators on the $\frac{1}{2}$ ⁸th of the said month of August, concerning the perfectioning and accomplishing the affairs of the peace he had consented to, all as he did consent by his declaration, as far as did agree with the articles concluded and agreed between the three states on the 21st of May, the 24th of July, and the 4th of August, concerning the establishing of the peace between himself and the king of Sweden; and perceiving, that the king of Sweden was averse to the treaty of peace, by the mediation of the before-mentioned respective public ministers, pretending that he was desirous to treat with the king of Denmark or his commissioners without the said mediators. The king of Denmark at the instance of the same, and especially of the right honourable the plenipotentiaries of England, and the extraordinary deputies or commissioners of the United Netherlands, did condescend thereunto; and his commissioners presented his demands in writing, being contained in five points, which were delivered to the lords the commissioners of the king of Sweden. And though the king of Sweden had neither by word of mouth by himself, nor by the lords his commissioners, much less in writing, declared his consent to the matters agreed on at the Hague, as is before expressed; yet did the king of Denmark at the instance of the said lords the mediators declare on the 18th day of September his consent to the reintegration of the said treaty of peace: and that he did conceive, that the place for the said treaty of peace would be convenient between the city of Copenhagen, and the

A.D. 1659. camp of the Swedish army, or any other near the said city. The before-mentioned public ministers of England, and the United Netherlands, after the several delays and tergiversations on the side of the king of Sweden, did in writing under their hands assure the king of Denmark on the 18th day of September aforesaid, that to the end the aforesaid peace might the sooner be obtained, that without cessation the king of Sweden should be compelled by all the forces to accept, and till he should accept of the conditions agreed on between the ministers of the three states, as being just and honest. All which being duly considered, the said lords the states general do conceive, that it is needless to propound new treaties; but that it is fit and just, that the former agreements here before expressed should be duly executed and performed, and that a general declaration of a readiness to enter into such further treaties, and is altogether ineffectual in the present conjuncture; and therefore have the said lords the states general of the United Netherlands ordered, that the said subscribed ambassador should in their name, and on their behalf, desire, that the said former agreements may be sincerely performed, not with words, but works. And in specie, that in pursuance and according to the before-mentioned fourth article of the treaty concluded, it may please the present government of this commonwealth to withdraw, and to recall effectually out of the king of Sweden's service, all English, Scotch, and Irish regiments; as also all officers, soldiers, and mariners of the same nations, who are yet employed, or to be found in the said king's service. And further, that according to the said agreement concluded on the 24th of July aforesaid the present government may keep with their forces, to compel the king of Sweden to accept of the said peace. And that to all admirals, vice-admirals, commanders, and sea captains, together with the governors and officers of the ports and places in the immediate service of the commonwealth of England, express orders be given to seize and to detain all Swedish ships, as well merchants as men of war, in such a manner as the said lords the states general of the United Netherlands have ordered, and commanded the same on their side. And lastly, that it may please the present government to order effectually and speedily, that some victuals, sea-coals, horse-meat, and other provisions, may be sent for the supply and relief of the before-mentioned city of Copenhagen, still beleaguered by the Swedish forces. To all which the said subscribed ambassador doth most sincerely and instantly beseech, that he may obtain a speedy and specific answer. Give the, &c.

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Samedy, le 6^{me} de Decembre, 1659. [N. S.]

Vol. lxvi.
p. 153.

L'ON a esté si surpris dans le bon succes de Funen, qu'autre chose de remarque n'a esté faite aujourd'hui.

Il y a esté parlé de la neutralité de la riviere de l'Elbe; qui les rois du nord se doivent declarer sur cela plus expressement.

Rememoration a esté fait pour donner une réponse au sieur Coyet, qui par ses propositions difficilement maintiendra ce que le roy son maitre n'a pu maintenir par ses armes; et si la prudence du passés et des retroactés juge le future, on doit avoir très-mechante opinion de Schoonen, Bleeking, et Hollandt; et qu'il le maintiendra aussy mal que Nyberg et Funen: et ne pouvoit faire avec reputation ny la paix ny la guerre, qu'il valoit mieux d'en elire la premiere.

Lundy, le 8^{me} dito.

Avec le sieur ministre d'Espagne est arresté, 1. Qu'au droffard Vander Maire seront contés 25 mille florins; et, 2. Que le clergé continueront recevoir leurs revenu. 3. Qu'au reste sera attendu le retour de l'ambassadeur, et demeurera en estat.

L'advis de Hollande sur Munster est leu: demain sera resolu, et apparemment selon cela.

Avec advis des sieurs Hauterive et Beverwert sera envoyé acte à col. Killegrew de commander les regiments; et même aussy à Copenhagen, si le sieur Pichler vint à mourir.

Mardy, le 9^{me} dito.

Il n'y a point eu des lettres de Copenhagen. Il est resolu de ne donner pas copie de cette lettre de le Maire sous son nom; à cause qu'il parle contemptiblement de Danois.

Il y a eu une lettre de Lubec et Hamburg sur l'affaire de la navire de Michel Suke de Lubec; item, une memoire sur le même sujet mis en mains de l'admirauté d'Amsterdam.

Sur

Sur l'affaire de Munster n'est encore rien conclu.

Sur la reception de l'ambassadeur de Portugal sont nommés les sieurs Lampfins et Beeck.

Il a fait requérir d'estre assisté du secretaire dans l'audience, principalement si l'ambassadeur d'Espagne a esté assisté de son secretaire ; mais on entend, qu'on n'admet à l'audience, que tel, qui est nommé dans la credentielle.

Mecredy, le 10^{me} dito.

Enfin la Hollande a produit et proposé son advis d'envoyer des ambassades vers l'Espagne et France, pour congratuler ces monarques sur la paix faite, &c.

Aussy la Hollande a consenty à l'envoye de douze frigates, pour assurer la mer Mediterannée.

Item, elle a urgé la retour du capitaine Cortener vers la fin de l'année, et avec la dernier esquadre de la flotte, qui reviendra icy. Il est amis de l'admiral Opdam et de la Hollande, ou la plus part le desire & a c'est signe, qu'Opdam a encore des amis en Hollande ; et il y a l'apparence, que les autres provinces s'y conformeront.

Il y a eu quelque nouvelle dispute ou scrupule à l'occasion de la commission du colonel Killegrew, si ce fera un regle, que consecutivement le plus vieil colonel en ces temps en Dennemarc commenderont.

Quant à Munster, la Hollande et la Frise ayant chacun dit son advis, l'on a sommé les autres provinces de se declarer aussy.

Jeudy, l'11^{me} dito.

Le concept interim pour le gouvernement de pais d'Outre-meuse, arresté avec le sieur ministre d'Espagne, est leu : la conclusion est remise jusqu'à demain.

La Hollande a fort insisté pour recevoir les compagnies, qu'elle a prestée à l'Overyssel durant la saison de l'estat ; à quoy Overyssel a fort contredit.

L'audience de l'ambassadeur de Portugal est remise jusqu'à samedi ; mais l'ambassadeur requiert fort, que ce soit demain. Les railleurs disent que c'est pour le sabat.

L'on a commis le conseil d'estat de s'enquerir, si le commendeur à Aerdenberg ne fait point d'exces touchant Slippendam.

Vendredy, le 12^{me} dito.

L'ambassadeur de Portugal a eu audience ; il a parlé assez court et en Portugaise, mais il aura donné en Latin : la substance sera, qu'il excusera le dilay de la paix, jettant la faute sur Don F. Telles, appellant son fait perfidum scelus.

Le sieur Boreel a derechef et encore escrit du lastgelt, ce qui fera un point d'instruction pour les ambassadeurs vers Paris.

Estant donné commission de mettre par escrit l'instruction en Holland, manquoit fort peu à la reponse à donner au sieur Coyet.

La Geldre ayant à donner la compagnie colonelle du colonel Wynbergen, en ont fait deux compagnies et deux capitaines, à quoy s'oppose à present le conseil d'estat ; et sur ce sont ordonnés des commissaires.

The Portuguese ambassador to the states general.

Lectum die 12 Decembris, 1659.

CELSI AC PRÆPOTENTES DOMINI ORDINES GENERALES,

MAGNUS ille voluntatis affectus quo regnum Lusitanum exarsit; veræ amicitiae cum hac inclyta republica conservandæ, manifeste patuit, quod nullam unquam ad hunc finem peripuerit ansam, si qua ei per legitimos ac naturales reges suos præberetur, qua de causa ubi primum Castellanorum jugum excussit, non diu cunctatum est, quin per solemnem legationem hujus veræ amicitiae cum hac inclyta republica studium manifestaverit; ut composito redintegratoque utriusque nationis amore simul arma caperent in hostem tunc temporis communem; qui etsi postea a vestris celsissimis potestatibus pacem obtinuit, non cum armis odium deposuit, conatusque renovandi eadem bella, quæ tunc coactus sub cinere doloso sopiebat; modo vero inito cum Gallis foedere, proculdubio resuscitabit: illud quod pristinam amicitiam atque concordiam rupit, certe non tam fuit dominantium utrique statui voluntas, quam quædam subditorum inscitia, audeo fatalitatem appellare. Modo vero vestris celsis potestatibus certum omnino facio regem dominum meum atque ipsius parentis majestatem ferenissimam, felicitis recordationis, ruptis moris omnibus, pacem iniri procurarunt æquis utrinque conditionibus, idque non solum ad belli damna vitanda, pacis fructus capiendos, verum etiam ut pristinus ille amor mutua correspondentia per tot annorum circulos conservata cum hac florentissima republica denuo revivisceret. Hujus rei ergo uterque rex ferenissimus varias legationes ad vestras celsissimas potestates dimiserunt, præsertim anno jam præterito D. Ferdinandum Telles, qui præterquam quod ob commissum

A.D. 1659 commissum perfidiæ scelus indignum se tanto honoris gradu reddiderit affectum hujus reciproci negotii tam magni momenti, remoratus est; hac de causa serenissimi regis mei majestas sui obsequii esse duxit me ad hanc legationem mittere, quantumvis regimine curisque reipublicæ præpedito, præcipue ut vestris celsissimis potestatibus gratias habeam ob patrociniū, quod sui fideles ministri in hac inclyta republica ea tempestate experti sunt, quod serenissimus rex sperat indies continuandum, ut optatum inter utramque nationem fœdus propere sanciat. Ego vero ex parte serenissimæ majestatis certam indubitamque facio omnem illam satisfactionem, quam æquitas poposcerit ad utilitatem utriusque status, ac suorum subditorum conservationem, quæ ut fiant, plenam mecum affero potestatem a vestris celsissimis potestatibus. Igitur impense rogo eos mihi commissarios constitui, quibuscum agere possim de sanciendo firmandisque pacis conditionibus, cujus stabilitatem mihi jam promittunt non solum bonitas ac sinceritas, quæ in vestris celsissimis potestatibus reperitur, sed etiam magna rerum prudentia, qua præsentia, habita futurorum consideratione, disponuntur, quæ satis indicant in præsentiarum, quæ et quanta emolumenta inter regnum Portugalliæ atque has inclytas provincias ex pace pullulent, ut ex mutuæ felicitatis augmento utraque eadem natio una atque eadem censeatur.

Hagæ Comitæ, 12. Decembris, 1659. [N. S.]

Signatum,

D. L. comte de MIRANDA.

De Thou, the French ambassador in Holland, to Bordeaux, the French ambassador in England.

MY LORD,

Hague, 12. Dec. 1659. [N. S.]

Vol. lxvi.
p. 168.

I THANK you for the information, which you are pleased to give me of affairs with you, upon which I rely much more than upon other particular letters, which come from England; which are most of them filled with passion, and therefore speak of the truth but imperfectly,

They publish news here pretended to be come by two ships, arrived at Rotterdam from Scotland, who bring advice, that Monck refuseth the accommodation, and had torn the treaty, which had been brought him; but I do very much suspect this news, since it comes from no person of credit, to persuade me to believe it. But that however of the defeat of the Swedes in Funen, which I called in doubt in my former, is found too true, which you will see in the inclosed copies. You will easily judge, that this accident will not much favour the negotiation of Monsieur Coyet, who hath yet no answer to his proposition, nor no commissioners named.

The ambassador of Portugal hath made his entry, and had this day his public audience. As to his subject, I said, that there was a time agreed on between Spain and them by our peace; but I did not speak of the time. Just now I am going to see him. By my letters from Paris, the ratification and the contract of marriage were signed the first of this month, and sent in all haste by an express to Bayonne, where the exchange is to be made, by the marshal of Grammont, the 7th of this month, after which exchange, I believe, we shall receive our orders.

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Samedy, le 13. Decemb. 1659. [N. S.]

Vol. lxvi.
p. 172.

LE ministre d'Espagne a derechef insisté pour le transport pour le bagage de Don Jean, pour la casse d'armes; sur quoy la Hollande n'a pas encore esté prest. Item, il a memorié touchant la chambre mypartie; sur quoy sera prins l'avis de commissaires.

La ville de Boileduc a remonstré quelque chose touchant un nouveau reglement de la creation de leur magistrat.

Le sieur Huygens & autres sont nommés pour commissaires à conferer avec l'ambassadeur de Portugal.

Le sieur de Hauterive aura dit à aucune des estats generaux en baillant avec l'ambassadeur d'Espagne, ou avec celui de Portugal; voulant dire, que le Portugal seroit bientôt mis sous l'Espagne.

L'interim sur le regiment du pais d'Outre-Meuse est maintenant extendue sur la date du 13. Decembre.

On a achevé de refoudre la revocation des compagnies d'Overyffel, qu'on y a mis durant la saison de l'hyver.

Lundy,

Lundy, le 15. dito. A.D. 1659

Par occasion que l'agent Bruninx escrit, que la cavallerie du prince de Condé alloit en service de l'evesque de Munster, le sieur president a mis sur le tapis l'affaire de deputés de la ville; sur quoy encore n'est rien conclu, si non une serieuse sommation de provinces à se declarer sur la proposition faite par les dits deputés.

L'admirauté d'Amsterdam a encore respondu aujourd'huy sur la nouvelle presentation de mettre caution pour la navire de Michel Suke de Lubeck, à fin qu'on laissoit là le navire, et qu'à Amsterdam il soit jugé; mais en vain, la dite admirauté persistant à vouloir, que le navire vienne icy. Sur les nouvelles pieces, que les ministres de Brandenburg ont importé en l'affaire contre la dame de Malsen, est resolu, que les pieces seront mis en main du grand conseil, pour aviser s'il y a raison pour changer et alterer la resolution que l'estat a prinse en cela.

Mardy, le 16. dito.

Aujourd'huy est proposé, de la part des estats de Frise, la revocation ou permission au sieur Haren, de retourner de Copenhagen icy, à l'exemple du sieur de Hubert. La Hollande l'a overgenomen avec apparence qu'elle y condescendra, voire y en qui sont d'avis, qu'on doive le rappeler tous.

L'on traine encore la response au sieur Coyet expressement, pour ressentir, que de mesme au commencement il a trainé son audience. Et aussy l'on attend des lettres de Copenhagen, pour voire comment à present se declare, et comporte le roy de Suede, touchant la paix, estant apparence, que cest estat ne voudra pas se separer d'avec la France & Angleterre.

Sur un nouveau petit memoire de deputés de Munster est resolu, que le sieur d'Ommersen et autres sont requis d'examiner bien l'affaire de Munster, et former un advis comment on fera: & la Hollande aussy l'a overgenomen.

Le secretaire de l'admirauté d'Amsterdam de Wildt a supplié par requeste à ce que son fils luy soit adjoint pour second secretaire, de telle sorte toutefois, qu'après sa mort son dit fils soit secretaire seul.

Mecredy, le 17. dito.

La Hollande produit une leur resolution provinciale, touchant le nouveau lastgelt en France; à sçavoir, qu'on y remediera par quelque inhibition d'aucunes manufactures de France, que ce point influera aussy dans l'instruction des ambassadeurs vers la France; & qu'on parlera avec les villes Hanseatiques; item, aussy en Angleterre.

Le sieur president a rapporté, que le sieur Coyet l'avoit veu hier, & après plusieurs discours avoit requis une response, & si elle seroit piquante, qu'il se trouveroit obligé à repliquer. L'on a sur cela admonesté & sommé les provinces à se declarer sur la proposition du sieur Coyet. Il semble qu'on attend quelque advis d'Angleterre.

Dans la requeste du secretaire de Wildt est resolu quelque chose, mais non pas si large comme il a desiré.

Sur le memoire de Groot est representé quelque chose de la part des estats d'Ost-Frise.

Il y a eu un memoire pour tel Loman schipper de Lubeck, pour estre redintegré comme la sentence prononcée à la confiscation de son bien & navire.

L'ambassadeur de France est allé à Amsterdam, & pour recommander l'ambassadeur de Portugal.

Jeudy, le 18^{me} dito.

La Hollande s'est declaré encliné pour la revocation du sieur Haren en Dennemarc, mais en exchange aussy desire, qu'au sieur Nieuport soit permis de revenir icy; item, au capitaine Jan Mees Cortenaer.

Quand on allegoit, que le sieur Nieuport estoit necessaire en Angleterre, fut répondu, qu'aussy bien en Angleterre estoit un anarchie ou nul regime.

Ceux d'Orange icy soupçonnent, qu'on brasse derechef quelque seclusion. Demain sera resolu sur cette revocation,

Le sieur de Raet a longtems rapporté dans les estats de Hollande ce qui est passé touchant le prisonniers, a remarqué, que l'an 1637, quand on a lu en service un nombre de navires excessif ces scheeps vrachten van leeger scheepen n'ont monté qu'à 200,000 francs; mais que l'an 1646 desja les mêmes scheeps vrachten ont monte à 1200,000 l. Il a fait grande plainte de la ville de Dorth, qui n'a pas voulu livrer tel van Angeren, qui a fort trompé dans ces larcins.

Pour répondre à Coyet l'on attende expressement des lettres de Copenhagen, pour savoir la contenance du roy du Suede.

Quand au passage de meubles de Don Jean, la Holland se declareroit demain.

A.D. 1659.

Vendredy, le 19. dito.

L'on n'a encore rien conclu touchant le retour ou permission de retourner pour Nieupoort Haren, Cortenaer: c'est que la Hollande a jugé n'en pouvoir pas encore venir à bout.

Il y a eu quelque rapport sur des affaires de prises de navires, spécialement des Osterlins, qui sont renvoyés à l'admirauté.

Il y a eu ouverture de quelques résolutions de Frise, spécialement touchant Dennemarc, relaschant aussi de la condition, qu'ils avoient lié l'affaire de Munster à celle de Copenhagen.

Vol. lxvi.
p. 178.

VOSTRE majesté aura asseurement appris quelque chose de differents, qui se meut entre les tuteurs du prince d'Orange, au sujet de la regence, et du gouvernement de sa principauté; sur quoy les ministres de Brandenburg dans leur memoire du 20. de ce mois, par ordre exprès de leur maistre, nous ont representé, comme quoy son altesse electorale, aussi bien que la princesse douariere d'Orange, inclinants aux remedes le plus benignes, avoient de temps en temps fait représenter à la princesse royale, aussi douariere d'Orange, avec toute sorte de douceur, les mauvaises suites de son proceder; & si elle ne vouloit entendre à ce que l'on composast les choses à l'amicable, que du moins en conformité de tant de sentences & traités, & d'accords, les parties s'en doivent rapporter au jugement de la justice, d'autant plus, que par une convention speciale du 26. May, 1654. elles estoient formellement tombés d'accord, que les affaires d'Orange demeuroident comme elles estoient jusqu'à ce qu'il plairoit à l'une ou à l'autre d'icelle, d'intenter proces, et de faire decider les susdits differents: mais que la princesse royale, au lieu de le deferer à des avis si salutaires, aux offices que le conseil de la maison avoit faits, et même à l'entremise de la cour d'Hollande, n'avoit répondu, sinon qu'elle ne pourroit rien resoudre sans la reine sa mere, & au prejudice de la parole qu'elle avoit donné. Cependant qu'elle faisoit presser le gouvernement d'Orange avec beaucoup d'animosité jusqu'à avoir fait exiger le peage à la main forte, transferer la seance du parlement hors de la jurisdiction du prince, & demander à votre majesté aide & assistance pour reduire la force par la force, non sans qu'il eust lieu d'apprehender par les artifices et les faux rapports de ceux, auxquels la reine de la grande Bretagne, & la princesse royale douariere d'Orange, avoient confié la conduite de cest affaire, votre majesté pourroit enfin être induit, quelque devoirs, qu'on peut faire au contraire, à leur accorder ce qui mettroit toute au desespoir, et tendroit au prejudice du pupille & de ses heretiers substitués, & renverser l'ordre de la succession establi par le prince Frederic Henry d'Orange d'heureuse memoire, dans son testament, dont nous etions executeurs, nous priant, que pour l'affection que nous avons tousjours eue pour sa maison, nous voulussions assister leurs altesse de nos avis & conseils, en une affaire si importante, & songer aux expedient de la terminer par un accomodement, du moins d'obvier à ce qu'il ne se fut rien de fait; & que par ce moyen l'interest du prince pupille fut mis à couvert les inconveniences, dont il estoit menacé, croyans consideré ce que dessus sur tous les grands & considerables services, que les princes d'Orange ont rendu de tout temps à cette republique, & voulant témoigner la part, que nous prenons en une chose capable d'affliger l'estat d'un prince mineur, à qui nous ne pouvons refuser nostre tres-serieuse intercession, sans faire tort à la justice & à l'affection, que l'on doit avoir pour conservation, de représenter à vostre majesté, que nous croyons, que le meilleur & le plus equitable fera que l'on s'entremette d'accommoder les tuteurs, à quoy la cour de justice s'employera icy à bon escient, ou bien, qu'on fasse decider leur different par de voyes, lesquelles la princesse royale si bien que les autres tuteurs, se trouvent obligé de choisir en vertu de leurs conventions susdits; & ne doutant point, que votre majesté n'ait les mêmes sentiments pour une chose si juste, comme ses predecesseurs n'ont jamais manqué d'estime pour le prince d'Orange, nous osons bien la prier d'y vouloir contribuer, en faisant connoître à la reine de la grande Bretagne, aussi bien que la princesse royale d'Orange, combien il y va de l'interest de leur fils & petit fils, de mettre hors de danger sa principauté, et que tout le monde attende de leur tendresse maternelle, qu'elles contribuent au reestablisement de l'union de la tutele, comme étant l'unique moyen de conserver leur pupille. En tout cas nous nous promettons de la justice de votre majesté, qu'elle ne contera point ceux, qui ne demandent qu'à porter les choses à l'extremité, & qu'elle ne fera passer son autorité dans une chose, qui est si éloigné de ses interêts. Vostre majesté fera en cela chose digne de sa grandeur & pieté royale, et comme les autres tutures ainsy, un jour le prince même auront sujet de s'en louer, nous le prendrons encore pour une marque singuliere de la bienveillance, qu'elle a tousjours fait paroître envers cette republique, &c.

Sir

Sir Arthur Haslridge, &c. to general Fleetwood.

MY LORD,

WE shall not trouble you with any tedious reply to your letter; but this we must affirm, A.D. 1659. that neither jointly nor separately did we, or any of us, either to yourself, or any other person, pass our engagements to do otherwise than we have done; and if you had given any of us a particular charge, we should readily have vindicated ourselves. Neither did we endeavour to remove the parliament's good opinion from you, though we well perceived your coldness in their service; else the paper sent from the northern brigadiers had never produced the sad consequences, that since have ensued. And if it was against your conscience to act as one of the seven commissioners appointed by act of parliament to govern the army, we marvel with what satisfaction you can now act by the call of private men, without any public authority, and yet pretend you desire retirement. Whether you have not been instrumental to destroy parliamentary authority, and how far we have been instrumental to any such ends, we leave it to the Lord and all indifferent men to judge. Neither shall we dispute the necessity, that induced the officers to interrupt the parliament; for if you and they say it was necessary, no man must dare to say otherwise. It is an easy matter to pretend to good things for the nation. Oliver did the like; but the sequel manifested his own advancement to be at the bottom; and it is well known, when you remove us from our foundations, you may carry us whither you please. We all deny to have been instrumental in any breaches made upon the parliament: but if we had, we should not be ashamed to ask God and the world forgiveness, and resolve by our future deportments to repair such breaches. Concerning oppression, imposing, restraining liberty, taking away property, governments, and authority, we shall only say, that whoever takes away our parliaments, takes the ready course to let them all in like a flood upon us. Neither do we think the council of officers competent persons to judge of governments, and to break parliaments, and put new fancies of their own instead thereof, as they please. How far your actings against the parliament, or ours in pursuance of the parliament's command, have given encouragement to the common enemy, we leave to your own consideration: or because the parliament will not act what some officers of the army please, they must be interrupted. And if any prove faithful to discharge the trust reposed in them, they are the only troublers of the nation, and give advantage to the common enemy.

We are not ambitious of commands, having more given us by the parliament, than we desired; but conceive we have more authority to grant commissions, in order to the parliament's restitution, than you can have from the call of any private persons to continue their interruption. You say, the mariners had been paid, if we had not been here. We suppose some of them are gone to London for their pay; and if money were sent to discharge the rest, we should be far from hindering their payment, or diverting their money. You pretend good intentions to the nation's settlement. We are sure our hearts thirst after it; and that we are not guilty of any hostility in this place. In the interim we resolve by God's blessing to defend the same for the parliament. If what you are doing might satisfy all the parliament's party, and secure parliamentary authority, the rights, liberties, properties of the people, and religion, (which is the good old cause so much owned by God, and valued by all good men) we should really rejoice and bless God for it, and readily return to our former friendship, it being the desire of our hearts, that all misunderstandings may be removed, the parliament restored, old friends reconciled, and the commonwealth settled upon righteous and lasting foundations. And if you are as peaceably minded as we, you may make it appear by directing the withdrawing of the forces you sent towards this place, that so effusion of blood and other mischiefs may be prevented. If otherwise, we cannot believe you intend peace. We are,

MY LORD,

HIER estoit bruit, comme si l'on avoit ordonné des commissaires pour venir en conference avec le sieur Cojet; mais cela est faux.

La permission de retourner ici pour l'ambassadeur Nieuport, & le sieur Haren, n'est nullement encore resoluë. Au contraire, entre divers advis de la province de Zelande est, qu'elle concède bien à l'ambassadeur Boreel de pouvoir faire un voyage vers ici; mais au sieur Nieuport la refusent.

De Copenhagen on a, que les trois deputés de cette estat estoient encore tousjours à Elfenor; qu'on y brouilloit beaucoup de papier, sans rien faire.

Quant à l'ambassade vers l'Espagne & France, il semble qu'on ne se haste guere en Hollande. Il se parle aussi encore de la triple alliance avec la France & l'Angleterre; maintenant faudroit-il y ajouter celle d'avec l'Espagne.

Dimanche, le 21. dito.

La Hollande a déclaré pour le passeport aux meubles de Don Jean; mais quant aux armes, en payant le droit de licentes. Et encore y en eust disants, que ce peu d'armes feroient peut-estre cause, que les Anglois (si d'avanture le navire Zelandois, qui les embarquera, tomboit en leur mains) confisqueroit tout, mesme des denrees libres de Zelandois. Il y eu memoires des ministres Danois & Brandeburg, & une lettre du roy de Dennemarc, qui est tout mis es mains de commissaires.

Au comte de Stierum, & aux fils de Puchler, & du sieur de Gent, sont données des compagnies.

Lundi, le 22. dito.

L'electeur Palatin, à qui on avoit recommandé de payer une debte que la reine de Boheme doit ici, a respondu, que c'est au parlement de payer les debtes de la dite reine.

Aujourd'huy en fin les amis du sieur d'Opdam ont tant fait, que les provinces ont consenti au retour du capitaine Cortenaer, pour estre examiné sur les accusations du sieur d'Opdam; car Cortenaer ayant esté capitaine du navire du sieur d'Opdam, & l'ayant gouverné, sçaura dire circumstantieusement comment est passé le combat au Sont. Il y a eu derechef une lettre de Lubec, en faveur d'un naviere confisqué à Amsterdam.

La Hollande enfin neantmoins produira un concept de réponse au sieur Cojet; mais pour encore ce ne sont encore que discours & paroles.

Demain les commissaires sur l'affaire de Munster tiendront conference pour former quelque avis comment on pourra faire.

Le prince Maurice a escrit d'avoir veu que 500 hommes à pied, & 100 à cheval de l'electeur de Cologne sont venu au service de l'evesque du Munster.

Mardi, le 23. dito.

Le ministre d'Espagne a representé des certaines scruples & griefs, qu'il trouve dans l'interim fait sur le regime du pais d'Outre-Meuse, qu'il desire avoir corrigé; & cela sera examiné.

Les deputés sur l'affaire de Munster ont commencé à examiner les pieces qui la touchant, & continueront.

Les compagnies qu'on pensoit oster de ville d'Overyssel, le conseil d'estat trouve à-propos de les y laisser encore quelque mois, d'autant qu'elles y ont fait leur provision d'hyver; aussi pour la jalousie que l'evesque du Munster y cause.

Les ministres de l'electeur de Brandenburg ont fait plainte, que le roy de France a établi un parlement & un peage hors de la jurisdiction d'Orange, requerants raet en daet, conseil & assistance. Sur quoi est resolu d'escire une lettre bien arraisonné au dit roy.

Les ministres de Dennemarc & de Brandeburg sont par le sieur de Heyde remerciés de congratulations, qu'ils ont fait à l'estat sur la victoire de Funen.

Il y a eu une conference sur l'affaire de Portugal pour mettre sur le papier quelques points, mais les bewinthebbers de la compagnie de West-Inde seront aussi appellés.

Tel de Witt, maistre de services à Bergopzoom hier examiné sur de accusations peculatus, ne sceut guere répondre: ordonné de revenir aujourd'huy, il a notifié par lettre, qu'il est allé à Bergopzoom, pour querir certains papiers; mais on a donné ordre de le suivre, & mettre sur la porte. On a aussi escrit au magistrat de Dort, pour avoir ce tel van Angeren; & on croit qu'ils le livreront.

Mecredi,

Mecredi, le 24. ditto.

A.D. 1659.

A l'ambassadeur de Portugal on a demandé son pouvoir, laquelle est & trouve bon & suffisant, joint aux autres papiers & besoins de cette nature-là.

Nouvelle instance estant fait pour la permission de revenir au sieur Haren, a esté resolu, qu'à lui sera escrit de mesme comme au sieur d'Huybert, qu'il lui sera permy de revenir ou repatrier, lorsqu'il jugera, que sa présence ne sera plus fructueux. Pour le retour du sieur Nieuport, n'a pas esté parlé.

Il y a derechef eu conference à ce matin sur les affaires de Munster, où sont les papiers responfifs au memoire du sieur Friquet, & au sieur eveſque.

Vendredi, le 26. dito.

Salva res est : On a trouvé une mot plus sincere que celui des elucidations, æquivocant avec elusions. On se sert en cet instrument du mot d'illustrations, comme si souvent l'illustration n'estoit plus obscure que la chose illustrée. — Ici l'on a prins si peu de reflexion là-dessus, qu'on a du depuis proposé d'équiper une flotte de 48 navires vers le printemps; & pour y donner chaleur, l'on a resolu de convoquer ici les deputés des admirautés.

Sir An. Ashley Cooper, &c. to general Fleetwood.

SIR,

UNDERSTANDING you have received some disturbance of late, in examining divers persons about a design to surprize the Tower; to save you further trouble, we do hereby freely own our utmost and hearty endeavours to have put that place into more faithful and confiding hands, and that by authority from the council of state, who at the passing of that resolve had the sole legal power from the parliament, of ordering, directing, and disposing of all the garisons and forces of this commonwealth, both by sea and land; an action so honest and honourable, as would not only have given check to the exorbitances at Wallingford-house and Whitehall, but was almost necessary to the preserving the peace and safety of this great city, by giving advantage to them to put themselves into a regular posture of defence; and such an encouragement to the sober party among them, as would (through God's mercy) have utterly defeated the designs of the common enemy. Sir, let us tell you, this design was not so vain, but that we had (by the blessing of God) possessed that place some weeks since, had we not been frustrated by our mistake in the courage and fidelity of a person, whose opportunity, interest, and duty, (if not principles) gave us better hopes. But in this age we are to complain and wonder at nothing; yet we cannot but highly resent the confidence of sending for one of our number by a party of soldiers, as if red-coats and muskets were a non-obstante to all laws and public privilege. Not as if that person or any of us are afraid or ashamed to own the enterprize before any, that have a lawful authority to demand an account of it; which we are sure no single person, juncto, or pack of men at Whitehall or Wallingford-house have a pretence to. Sir, we have the witness with our own spirits, that we have and do cordially wish the preservation and good of you and your family: but if the Lord hath said, You shall not hearken, but be hardened in your way, we must acquiesce in his providence, and with sorrow look upon that ruin, which is flowing in upon you, as upon one, in whom we thought we had seen some good!

Sir, consider that in the day of trouble, which is certainly coming upon you, what support you will have to your spirit, when you shall be assaulted with the shame you have brought upon God's people; with the breach of faith to the parliament, from whom you received your commission; with the ruin you have brought upon your native country (unless the Lord by his own almighty arm prevent it); and with the misery you have led the poor soldiers into, who, instead of being the instruments of renewing and settling the peace and liberty of these nations, enjoying the honour and quiet thereof, their arrears fully paid, future pay and advancement settled and established in order and with the blessing of their countrymen, are now become the instruments of nine mens ambition; have made the whole nation their enemies, and are exposed again to the hardship and hazard of a new unnatural war, without prospect of our hoping, that the issue of these affairs can leave their new masters so rich as to satisfy their arrears; or so secure as to trust preferments in any hands, but such whose fanatic principles, or personal relations make them irreconcilable to the public interest. But God (we trust) has raised up a deliverer, having by admirable providence put an opportunity and power into the hands of general Monck, the ablest and most experienced commander of these nations; whom he hath also spirited to stand firm for the interest of this commonwealth, as well against a rebellious party of

A.D. 1659. our own forces, as the designs of the common enemy, notwithstanding all causeless and false aspersions maliciously cast upon him; being warranted in his present actings by especial commission and authority from the council of state, whereas yours is that only of the sword. Our prayers and earnest request for you and all honest men amongst you are, that you may timely join with him, and partake of the honour and blessing of his actions, and your true repentance shall be a greater rejoicing, than your desertion was trouble; when providence shall have separated the precious from the vile, and not have suffered our scum to boil in; but shall have placed the sword and civil authority in the hands of men of the best and soberest principles. Sir, be not so far deceived, as to think sober men see not through the mask of this strange new parliament, whose liberty and safety either of meeting or debating must be at your pleasure; who having taken upon you to be conservator of the cause, will only make use of them as your assessors and tax-gatherers; the present interrupted parliament being the sole lawful authority, and which can only be hoped to make the sword subservient to the civil interest, and settle the government in the hands of the people by successive and free parliaments unlawfully denied to them. Sir, we have in sincerity given you our sense, and shall leave you to him, that disposes of all mens hearts; and remain

Your servants, so far as you shall be found to serve the public,

AFTER debate, it is thought fit, that a copy of the letter, which their H. and M. lordships writ on the 23d instant to the king of France, in favour of the lord prince of Orange, and the preservation of that prince in that family, shall be sent to the lady princess royal, with this addition, that their H. and M. lordships not without great reason apprehend and foresee, that from the differences risen about the government of the said principedom, there will unavoidably result an infallible and irreparable damage and prejudice to the said lord prince, which their H. and M. lordships would willingly see prevented and taken up; and therefore their H. and M. lordships leave it to the consideration of her royal highness, whether she shall not think fit for the good of her own son to agree the difference in love, by referring of it to some arbitrators; or in case that cannot be, to cause the same to be decided by the courts of justice in Holland.

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Vol. lvi.
p. 180.

IL y a eu une lettre du prince d'Ost-Frise responsive ou relative aux ordres, qu'ici on a donné pour executer la dette ou le payement promis en suite de la resolution du 8. Fev. 1657; & substance de cette lettre seroit, que le dit prince d'Ost-Frise n'est pas justiciable, moins executable ici, comme estant un prince de l'empire, n'ayant nulle dependance ici; ce qui est bien vray: mais il y a des traites, qui le rendent dependent.

En Angleterre l'on aura relasché le navire nommé Marc Aurele. L'ambassadeur Nieuport avoit bien tasché de venir en conference sur les affaires du Nort; mais la confusion estoit grande, & point d'inclination pour besoigner. Au reste n'escrit quelques choses imprimés: que parmi le 70, qui formeroient le model de regimen, estoit peu de consequence, les uns estant pour la milice, les autres pour le parlement, aucuns pour le protecteur Richard, voire aucuns pour le roy.

Il y a eu une lettre de la Classe de Dort, touchant le ministre de tel village au Princelant, où la princesse de Hohenzollern est pour tel, & les paroisiens pour tel.

Le sinode d'Hollande a fait plainte de ce que l'on imprime & sème ici tant de livres Sociniens.

Lundi, le 29. dito.

L'affaire de Portugal est sur le tapis; mais pour encore entre les provinces, ou entre les députés d'icelles, à sçavoir pour former les demandes, aucunes (specialement la Zelande) desirent desirent de terres en Brazil; & ont en charge de demander de terre comme une condition A.D. 1659.

sine qua non; mais l'ambassadeur sous mains declare preliminairement, que ce n'est pas au pouvoir du roy de donner de terres. Pour neantmoins l'y disposer, on lui propose sous mains, que ce sera au bien de Portugal d'engager par ce moyen cest estat à resister tant mieux contre l'Espagne.

L'ambassadeur de France procede assez finement pour avoir le nom de ne s'en mêler point; mais par le sieur de Groot ne laisse pas de s'en mêler.

Il y a eu avis de grand damage arrivé aux fortifications de Lieroort, pour reparation desquelles est envoyé quelque ordre provisionel.

Des affaires de Suede ni réponse au sieur Cojet rien encore; car si on répond, on fait contre la redintegration; & si la paix se fait, toute la negotiation du sieur Cojet est aneantié.

Mardi, le 30. dito.

L'on a neantmoins trouvé necessaire de répondre au sieur Cojet, à fin qu'il ne croye agnita maledicta; à quel propos est produit le concept d'Hollande, qui est leu, contenant depuis longues années de contre-reproches.

A la fin neantmoins on se declare prest à ouvrir ce qu'il pourra plus proposer; & à cette fin concéder conference: mais on desirera, que préallablement il aye à s'esclaircir sur ces passages, Artibus certorum hominum, &c. Et paucorum quorundam ausu, &c. puis pour la conclusion de la paix, que les deputés de cest estat sont suffisamment instruits pour le faire au Sond, &c. Demain cela sera encore resumé.

Quant à Portugal, l'on remarque, qu'entre la Hollande & Zelande, il n'y a point de convenience. La Portugal offre la trafique sur Angola.

A l'evesque de Munster sera répondu sur son compliment.

A l'instance d'Utrecht, sera emané un placard aigre contre le livre Socinien, nommé, De l'apostasie des Chrestiens.

Mecredi, le 31. dito.

La réponse, qui sera donné au sieur Cojet, est arresté; mais elle sera translaté en Latin, & ce sera fait par un qui couche bien en Latin.

Il y aura eu un memoire en Latin du sindic de Munster, representant la necessité de la ville, & qu'elle soit comme bloquée, si non affligée; demandant secours ou prompt resolution: sur quoi les provinces sont requis de se declarer; mais le sieur Ommeren étant absent, la conference ne se pourra resumer que vendredi.

Le conseil d'estat a representé, que pour quelque peu de temps l'on fera bien de laisser encore les compagnies en Overysiel.

Jeudi, le 1. Janvier, 1660.

Le sieur Boreel a escrit, que bien dix ou onze navires Hollandois estoient prins, & mesmes au Brest en Bretagne, par des predateurs Portugais; mais qu'à son instance le roy les avoit relaché, tant à cause qu'aussi bien le roy de Portugal à la Haye faisoit traiter de paix, que parceque l'affaire estoit inique.

L'ambassadeur de France a donné à entendre, qu'il a ordre de faire notification solennelle de la conclusion de la paix entre les deux couronnes.

Le sieur de Heyde a notifié au ministres des villes Hanseatiques la resolution prise contre le last-gelt, qu'on veut introduire en France.

Vendredi, le 2. dito.

L'on aura mis quelque chose sur le papier les affaires de Portugal, sur quoi à ce soir sera conference avec l'ambassadeur de ce royaume. Le sieur Huygens auroit acheté beaucoup de les actions, & seroit moins incliné à l'accord.

Les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc sont notifiés d'estre à Haerlem. L'on fera remercier les ministres d'Espagne, pour avoir notifié par le sieur president le souhait de nouvelle en que le prince n'est pas malade, & que l'ambassadeur sera dans dix à douze jours ici.

L'ambassadeur Nieupoort encore a demandé permission de venir ici, & communiquer choses d'importance; mais rien n'est fait sur cela.

JE vous fouhaite tour heur & felicité de corps & d'ame en cette nouvelle année, & tous fuivantes, & que par de-là l'estat puiſſe revenir une fois à repos; car pour encore il ſert de riſée & de mocquerie, comme d'ordinaire le meritent qui ſe donnent à diſſention, tumulte, & diſputes; eſtant une grande benediſtion ici, qu'on ſ'y maintient ſi bien & louablement en union, qui rend ceſt estat conſiderable; ſi que le roy de Suede meſme l'a daigné d'un envoye extraordinaire, qui eſt le ſieur Cojet, lequel on a laiſſé mortifier un bon ſpace de temps, en meſpris (en effet) de ſon maiſtre. Et quoiqu'eventuellement tout le difference entre ceſt estat & ſon roy ſoit vuidé & compoſé, neantmoins on lui va donner une reſponſe aſſez expoſtulatoire, en demandant un elucidaſion nouvelle ſur les deux paſſages chocquants de ſa propoſition. Et en fin ceſt estat ſeul (effectivement) eſt cauſe, que le roy de Suede n'a ſceu reuſſir, ny en Pruſſie, ny en Dennemarc; & le roy de Suede le témoigne aſſez par l'envoy du ſieur Cojet, tentant pour la fin, ſ'il pourroit ſeparer ceſt estat, & donner ici quelque contentement particulier & ſeparé. Mais ceſt estat a eſté ſi genereux & fier, qu'il n'a pas voulu venir en conference avec lui, pour ne pas faire à croire, qu'il ſ'eloignoit de ſa reſolution conſtante.

Tout cela, diſ-je, ceſt estat ne ſeroit pas capable de faire, ſ'il n'eſtoit uny: ſi la moindre diſcorde eſtoit en ceſt estat, le roy de Suede ſ'en mocqueroit.

Mais les Anglois pour leur diſordre ne peuvent faire ni mal à leurs ennemis, ni bien à leurs amis. L'on dit, que chacun jette la faute ſur l'autre: c'eſt l'ordinaire; mais acerba fata Romanos agunt. C'eſt une fatalité: Dieu le veut ainſi; & quo fata trabunt.

Le roy de Suede auſſi, ſ'il eſt ſage, ſe retirera, & acceptera la paix, voyant que la France fait ſes propres affaires, & que l'Angleterre n'eſt pas capable de ſe ſoucir des exotiques. Et auſſi elle a monſtrée aſſez de ne vouloir pas ſeconder la Suede.

Vous m'avez ci-devant preſté la main à la ſatisfaction des livres, que j'ai envoyé environ le 1. de Decembre. J'en attendois derechef quelque choſe; mais je crains que ce marchand ſera diſtrait, & pas y ſongeant.

J'eſpere bien-toſt vous envoyer une cinquieme partie; mais cependant j'ai trouvé à propos de vous en toucher. Si penſez, que ce ſeroit à-propos qu'on ſe ſouviend de ce reſtant. Je ſerai attendant quelque mot de reſponſe, pour me regler ſelon cela. Je ſuis

MY LORD,

Vol. lxvi.

p. 188.

I AM too much obliged to you for the favour, which you are pleaſed to ſhew me in the ſhare, which you take in all my accidents and ill rencounters. And although I am not yet quite recovered, yet I begin to act again, having yeſterday made ſome viſits. I thank you for your advice, which I receive weekly, and to which I give more credit than to any other; for I find your relations of affairs more perfect than any I meet with here. I wonder Monſ. Downing has not been yet to ſee you, ſince you write nothing of it. By the laſt letter from Tholouſe of the 14th of Decembre from Monſ. de Brienne the ſon, I had order to ſignify the peace of Spain to the lords ſtates, which I will perform to-morrow, by a memorandum only, not thinking it convenient to aſk audience, ſince I have not the articles of the peace to communicate to them.

I received likewise at the ſame time, by the way of Germany, the communication of a letter of his majeſty, writ to the commiſſaries of Franckfort, and which he ſent by an expreſs; wherein his majeſty declares to the princes of the empire, that if by the end of February next the king of Sweden be not reſtored into the places of Pomerania, which have been taken from him, he will enter into Germany with all his forces, to make good to him the treaty of Munſter; which is a declaration, about which the miniſters of Sweden will not fail to compliment your lordſhip, ſince they would not hope a more advantageous nor a more glorious one for the intereſts of their maſter. Here incloſed I ſend you two letters, from Monſ. de Terlon, and one from Monſ. de Lombres. Monſ. Terlon writes, that he hath good hopes of the peace between Sweden and Denmark, provided there happen no hindrance from hence.

The Portuguese ambassador to the states general.

Read the 5th of Jan. 1660. [N. S.]

YOUR lordships know in what condition Don Fernando de Telles left the negotiation of the treaty of peace at his departure from this court, and out of my master's service; and the three propositions, which he hath made of the tenth October, 1658, have not been accepted by the states general: wherefore Don Fernando Telles sent into Portugal Diego Lopes Dulhoa, gentleman of the embassy, to give an account to the king my master, of the posture of the said negotiation. He came back to this court the 22d of July last, with the king's answer to the said Don Fernando, who was not then to be found; which coming to the king's knowledge, he commanded me to leave my government, and come to continue the negotiation of the peace, to the end it may be concluded, and commanding me to observe the order given to Don Fernando Telles: and in pursuance thereof I present to the states all that the said Don Fernando hath offered in the three propositions, which he made to your lordships, with the conditions and declarations, as they are there comprised.

And in regard of the sum of three millions and a half, which are offered, it should be augmented in quantity as much as the present estate of Portugal can permit, being burdened with the war of Castile, being constrained the last year to maintain six armies, two in the province of Minho, and four in Alemtego against the Tagus; and now he shall be constrained to keep up a more powerful force to hinder the design of the Castilian, who is at present without war with France. And seeing that my master the king takes into serious consideration the certainty and assurance of what he offers to the states, he doth not present them the utmost, which his good will desires by that, which the kingdom is able to give at present. And I increase the commerce, which shall be general, as it is considered in America and Africa, and also in Asia, and in all places, ports, and havens, which are under the command of the king my master, provided that they do not exercise the commerce of the subjects of Portugal, which shall be observed according to reason, in the same manner as the king my master hath granted to the English, and neither the one nor the other shall have less liberty, but equally. Besides the said commerce, I offer another, which hath been always desired by the Northern nation, viz. the salt of St. Ubes, the which my master will wholly grant by contract to these states and their subjects upon reasonable conditions; by the assurance whereof may be prevented all abuses of the prices of salt, and establishing it in such manner as may reciprocally be good for the one and the other.

And for satisfaction of the two nations, as well of the king my master, as their states, which may be incommoded, such an agreement shall be made between commissaries, which shall be executed according to right and good justice.

And since that the king my master desires a good, firm, and sure peace with those states, he doth not permit, that in any part of his kingdoms be used any war or hostility, which may be contrary to the good correspondence, which he should desire: wherefore he desires, that the one and the other do keep what they do possess in the West-Indies; and that there be for the future a free general commerce, as there shall be in Brasil and the conquests of the West.

I hope, that the states will with their prudence consider this proposition, considering the condition wherein the king my master is at present, who can make no greater offers, nor more plain declaration, wherewith he demands peace: and by how much the effects of it tend to the preservation of his kingdoms, by so much the more will be the advantage, which this state will receive thereby; which we pray that your lordships will please to report.

El conde DE MIRANDE, ambassadeur.

A letter of intelligence.

MONSIEUR,

L'ON est ici en une grande attente de ce qui viendra du Nort, & comment le roy de Suede s'aura declarer. Il est fort à croire, qu'il aura embrasser le traité ou convention de la Haye de l'esté passée, passant par dessus Drontheim, car les Danois prennent grand courage; redit in præcordia virtus. Certes même à la Haye ils ont eu de l'avantage sur les François en la remonte des carosses. Les François y sont revenu avec leur espées legeres; mais les Danois ont eu des bons coutelas, au moins un coupant les François comme des roseaux. Cependant le sieur de Thou n'est pas homme pour souffrir. Il est vray, que les ambassadeurs Danois s'en veulent laver les mains, se deschargeant sur les deputés de cest

A.D. 1659. estat; mais leurs gens ont tiré l'espée, & s'en sont mēlée, & le debat a duré toute long du chemin, voyant de leurs jeulx, que les carosses se font cortoyes, & comme chocques continuellement. Ils disent, nous ne devons pas faire la loy, ni le stile, mais la loy & stile des ambassadeurs est juris gentium, & doit estre connu à tous ceux, qui se mēlent d'estre ambassadeurs. Chacun doit sçavoir son metier, & le roy de Dennemarc electif n'a jamais disputé le rang à un roy de France. Je vous laisse penser le creve-cœur, qu'en doivent avoir les François. Lisez Virgile du combat de taureaux: Alter Victus abit, longaque ignotis exulat oris, Multa querens ignominiam plagasque superbi Victoris. N'estre pas fort ignominieux, que l'on aye detourné ainsi le carosse de son excellence, puis souffrir plagas superbi victoris; & souffrir cela de ceux, que le carosse venoit honorer.

Le sieur ambassadeur de Thou ci-devant pour une faute du sieur Rosewinge (d'avoir visité l'ambassadeur d'Espagne, devant qu'avoir visité celui de France) a tousjours remis la visite de Rosewinge. Si maintenant il peut digerer les coups d'espée des Danois, je seray curieux de sçavoir. L'ambassadeur de Portugal fust obligé même de quitter son chapelain ou prestre, pour complaire à l'ambassadeur de Thou; mais peut-estre qu'il ne relevera pas ceci si haut. Cependant les Danois ont beaucoup d'avantage, ayant l'empereur, la Pologne, le Brandeborgh, & (qui est le principal) cest estat de leur costé, d'armées par tout victorieuses; au contraire les Suedois sont par tout battus. Les Danois cependant ne dissimulent guere, qu'ils viennent offrir à cest estat de tels pieces (je pense Lantkron & Malmo) à condition de s'engager en guerre pour les prendre.

Et considerant bien toutes choses, je ne voy pas bien, comment le roy de Suede se depestrera de cette guerre, s'il ne contente les trois estats, en acceptant les conventions de la Haye. Je suis

Des affaires d'Angleterre, que fera-ce?

Je ne sçay pas ce que fera de mon debiteur, que je vous avois recommandé.

Extract out of a latter from Fowy, the 3d of January, 1659.

SIR,

Vol. lxvii.
p. 43.

OUT of my respects to yourself particularly, and generally being sensible of the sufferings of honest merchants in their trade, by private men of war, I make bold to advise you, that last evening here was brought into this port a dogger-boat or hoy, of about an hundred tons, named the White Swan of Fleeland, schipper Peter Hans Boy, her lading consisting of thirty tuns of wine, and the rest in chefnuts, loaden in the river of Bourdeaux, bound for Amsterdam. The men of war say, she was taken by one captain John Welch, commander of a small frigate commissioned by the king of Sweden, but set forth out of Dunkirk. I required to see the copy of the commission, but it seems they have none, nor any thing to shew. Upon which the vice-admiral thought it his duty to stop the said prize here, and to secure all things for the proprietor, until it shall be ordered by the supreme authority. The man of war's name is the John Baptist of Gottenburgh. I thought good to advise you hereof, to the end you would be pleased to communicate the same to the Dutch embassador in London, that so some speedy course may be taken for preferring of the goods being perishable. There is only in the prize the steersman and two or three men more; the schipper and the rest are aboard of the man of war.

Mr. Ph. Meadowe to the council of state.

 and a half service
 To a groom, for ten months service, at the rate of twelve pounds } 10 0 0 per ann.

Sum total, £. 317 10 0

I also most humbly beseech the right honourable the council of state on behalf of myself, that in consideration of my long service in forrein parts, having been the minister of this commonwealth in the courts of three several princes, during which employment I have often exposed my life and health to the publique service, and altogether abandoned my own occasions and services heer at home, to grant me stil the continuation of my salary, it being but the same, which I formerly had from the parlement before the interruption in 1652; as also to grant me the arrears thereof, I being behind for three quarters, before the parlement was restored, and three quarters more since their restitution; which is the whole of my wages and recompense for my so long, painful, and hazardous service.

And I shall remain, as in duty bound,

YOUR HONORS

most humble and most faithful servant,

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Samedy, le 3. Janvier, 1660. [N. S.]

L'AMBASSADEUR de France avec le souhait d'un bon nouvel an, a notifié par un memoire la paix avec l'Espagne avec des compliments de bon affection, &c. Item, aussy a asseuré l'inclination & la bon intention, que son roy a pour la paix au nort, & même aussy pour la paix en Allemagne. Le roy de France auroit dit, quant à la Suede, & pour son assistance, tout d'assistance pour maintenir le roy de Suede en Allemagne, qu'il voudra, voire, je viendra en Allemagne en personne, s'il est besoin; mais il faut, que la paix se face avec Dennemarc.

L'on pensoit rendre le compliment par le Sieur de Heyde; mais je remarque, qu'on luy donnera une response par escrit.

En la conference avec Portugal hier n'est rien fait, si non que l'ambassadeur a offert 7 millions de francs. Le traffique sur St. Ubes privativement pour la compagnie seule, & puis le libre traffique par tout, mais à condition reciproque. Bref on est bien loin d'accorde encore.

Le maistre d'hostel Hessel, notifiant, que les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc sont à Haerlem à supplier de l'argent par avance pour les traiter, sur quoy on a requis les gecommitteerde Raden de Hollande.

Lundy, 5. dito.

Les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc sont allés, & se tiennent à Delft: l'on a nommé le comte de Flodroff & le S. Schulenborgh pour les recevoir à lieu accoustumé, lorsqu'ils notifierent de vouloir venir. Le grifier est commandé de mettre par escrit une resolution en response du memoire, que l'ambassadeur de Thou a fait exhiber samedy passé, qui ne sera qu'un retour aux compliments, que l'ambassadeur a fait touchant la paix, celle du nort, & le souhait du bon nouvel an.

L'on a fait rapport de la conference tenue avec Portugal, qui offre un peu plus que ce que les Portuguais ont offert cy-devant. Cely sera mis en mains des commissaires pour l'examiner & ballancer avec ce qui a esté offert cy-devant. L'admirauté de Harlingen a escrit

fur

A.D. 1659. sur les plaintes du prince d'Ost-Frize & de la ville d'Embden, ce qui sera examiné contre les retroactes & les lettres du dit prince & ville. L'on a resolu d'envoyer un navire de guerre vers Brest, pour reconduire in salvo les navires, que le roy de France a relaschés.

L'on a derechef eu conference sur l'affaire de Munster, & ils mettront quelque rapport sur le papier pour l'exhiber dans un jour ou deux.

Mardy, le 6. dito.

L'affaire de Munster a esté sur le tapis : l'on a propose d'escrire une lettre arraisonnée à l'evesque : aucuns aussy ont parlé d'escrire à l'empereur, mais ny en l'un ny en l'autre n'est encore rien déterminé.

L'on a nommé aucuns, qui accompagneront demain au soir les ambassadeurs de Denne-marc au souper, faisant estat que demain ils feront leur entrée.

Dans la réponse à donner à l'ambassadeur de France aucuns vouloient faire influencer, qu'icy en a resolu d'envoyer un ambassade. L'on a desja donné ordre de concevoir une instruction pour la dite ambassade.

De Dennemarc n'ont encore esté nulles lettres.

Mecredy, le 7. dito.

Voulant conclurre le rapport dans l'affaire de Munster, la Hollande a déclaré, qu'il failloit devant tout en parler au Sieur Friquet ministre Imperial. Aussy semble (au moins aussy est dit dans l'assemblée) que la Hollande commence d'avoir quelque plus d'appetit pour la ville : principalement si la paix se fait au nort.

Il y a eu nouvelle dispute pour les compagnies, qui sont en garnison en Overysse.

A ce soir les ambassadeurs seront accompagnés des sept estats generaux, estant dit, que famedy auront audience. Item, est dit, que ces ambassadeurs font l'ambassade à leurs propres depens.

Demain sera conference sur les affaires d'Outre-Meuse.

Le Sieur Heinsius estant allé à Amsterdam, cela delaye la réponse pour le Sieur Cojet.

Le Sieur de Heyde a rapporté d'avoir rendu au Sieur ministre d'Espagne le souhait de bon nouvel an.

La réponse à donner par escrit au Sieur ambassadeur de Thou estoit oubliée ce matin : mais sera faite pour demain.

Jeudy, le 8. dito.

L'ambassadeur de France a fait aigre plainte aux estats generaux de ce que le comte de Flodroff hier a commandé de la part de l'estat à son carosse, & à son escuyer, de tenir tel ou tel rang, & puis de se retirer hors de la suite des carosses, taxant l'assemblée d'avoir deputé une personne, qui n'a pas asses d'age ny de experience, &c.

L'assemblée a deputé & envoyé à ce soir les Sieur de Gent & le raet-pensionnaire, d'aller informer l'ambassadeur autrement. Et le comte de Flodroff dit d'avoir commandé de la part de l'estat à ceux, qui avoient tiré l'espée, de remettre l'espée au fourreau, & il se sent fort piqué de l'ambassadeur.

Les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc veulent aussy, que le Sieur Cojet quite certaine place dans l'eglise Lutherienne, ce que l'autre refuse, comme estant en possession.

Il y a eu conference sur l'interim au pais d'Outre-Meuse. Demain il y en aura un autre sur le même sujet, pretendents, qu'ils donneront satisfactions au ministre d'Espagne.

Vendredy, le 9. dito.

Les Sieurs de Gent & raet-pensionnaire ont rapporté d'avoir esté voire l'ambassadeur de France, justifiant ou excusant ce qui estoit hier arrivé, au moins niant tout ce qui estoit offensif, requerant l'ambassadeur de vouloir retirer son memoire, & n'en escrire rien au roy. Il respondu, qu'il ne sauroit pas se passer d'en escrire au roy, veu qu'il en auroit tant d'autres qui escriroient ; mais qu'il enverroit en même façon ce que par escrit on luy voudroit donner de justification, & qu'il se rapporteroit à la satisfaction, que le roy en prendroit. Sur cela donc luy sera donnée une resolution par escrit.

Dans le memoire de l'ambassadeur il y a eu ces mots, parlant du comte de Flodroff, qui paroît si peu savant en ces choses : le comte de Flodroff auroit desja devant qu'aller vers le Hamburg, dit à l'escuyer de l'ambassadeur de France la Richardiere, que luy (le dit comte) pourroit pretendre de suivre avec son carosse immediatement après la carosse de l'estat ; mais qu'il cedit cela, & desiroit n'en estre pas fait rapport. De l'affaire de Munster est rapporté, qu'on donnera une réponse au Sieur Friquet, qu'on escrira une lettre au Sieur evesque, & à la ville, &c. Mais de tout cela est demandée copie pour les provinces.

A letter

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Samedy, le 10. Janvier, 1660. [N. S.]

LE Sieur Otto Kraegh a fait sa proposition en Flammend, mais l'a exhibé par écrit en A.D. 1659. François. Il a harangué avec bonne grace, & une façon grave, & qui promet beaucoup de probité. Il a fait un recit pertinent & fort particulier de ce qui est passé, étant un abrégé de ce qu'on a vu dans le manifeste de Dennemarc. Le principal aura esté un compliment de remerciement de ce que cest estat a assisté leur roy, & auroit dit entre autres, qu'eux & leur posterité seroient redevables à cest estat de la conservation du sceptre & couronne de Dennemarc, & des droits, privileges, & libertés des sujets, en outre demandants des commissaires, qui leur donnent le Sieur Huygens & autres.

Les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc ont chassé certain valet François, & ont promis de chasser celui, qui a coupé le bras du laquay de l'ambassadeur de France; & ils ont retenu leur carosse de l'audience aujourd'hui; & à ce soir ont fait remercier l'ambassadeur de France de ce qu'il a envoyé son carosse à ce matin. La princesse douariere aussi a promis de chasser un laquay, qui a assisté contre les chevaux & carosse de France. Les estats generaux ont donné par les Sieur de Gent & le raet-pensionnaire un verbal ou écrit, signé de la main du comte de Flodroff & du Sieur de Schulenborgh, desadvouant tout ce qui est passé au desavantage du carosse de l'ambassadeur, qui encore desire, qu'on chasse le messager, qui a porté la parole à l'escuyer de l'ambassadeur de France, qui toutefois declare, que le comte de Flodroff & le Sieur Schulenborgh ce luy ont commandé; mais eux le nient.

Lundy, le 12. Jan.

L'ambassadeur de Thou a par memoire fait plainte aux estats generaux du messager, qui a portée la parole à l'escuyer & cocher de l'ambassadeur, qu'il auroit à se retirer avec le carosse, desirant que le dit messager soit chassé & chastié.

Le dit messager a esté valet du Sieur Veth, & maintenant est en voyage. Aussi le dit messager est examiné, & a déclaré & tesmoigné de même façon, comme le comte de Flodroff & Schulenborgh.

L'on a resolu d'envoyer le commis Spronssen à l'ambassadeur de France, à luy dire, que le dit messager a déclaré comme le comte de Flodroff, & que trouvant plus de faute, on le punira, mais qu'à present il est absent; & si le sieur ambassadeur n'est pas content, on le lairra faire.

Le réponse à donner à Sieur Cojet est leu, & prest à luy estre donnée.

Des estats d'Oost-Frise est venu la somme de 86300 francs, y manquant environ 10000 francs, dont ils jettent la faute sur le prince d'Oost-Frise, suppliant la mainforte contre le prince.

Mardy, le 13. Jan.

Le commis Spronssen a rapporté d'avoir parlé à l'ambassadeur de France, qui ne pouvoit pas croire, que le messager estoit allé en message à son tour; mais qu'on l'avoit éloigné expressement; desiroit qu'à son retour on l'examinast plus expressement; dit avoir écrit & envoyé le tout au roy, & attendra ce que S. M. ordonnera.

Il n'y a eu qu'une lettre du Sieur Haren du 2. Janvier de Copenhagen, disant, que les autres estoient à Elfenor à l'invitation des ministres de France & d'Angleterre, sans écrire autre chose de la pacification.

Cependant la flotte de Ruyters de la proviande & de bois tous estoient bien arrivées.

Dans les affaires ou conferences, soit avec les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc, soit avec les Suedois, n'est rien receu seulement, que le Sieur raet-pensionnaire feroit tenir au Sieur Cojet sa réponse, ou rien n'est changé que le mot delegatus & ablegatus, d'autant que dans la credentielle du roy même estoit ce mot d'ablegatus.

La Zelande a faite plainte des certains navires marchands, tant Hollandois que Hanseatiques, que le gouverneur Lockhart avoit fait arrester à Dunquerque, sur quoy sera faite plainte. Tant du duc que des estats d'Oost-Frise sont venues les sommes d'argent, qui devoient estre payés le 11. Novembre passé.

Mecredy, le 14. Jan.

Le Sieur agent de Heyde a porté au Sieur Cojet ce matin la réponse sur la proposition. Il a rapporté, que le Sieur Cojet luy a asseuré la victoire des Suedois près de Bahuys sur la cavallerie de Norvege, environ mille chevaux; & que le roy de Suede alloit poursuivre la victoire.

J'ay de bon part, que le roy de Suede a laissé entre les mains des ambassadeurs des trois estats un instrument de paix semblable au traité de Roschild. Le roy de Dennemarc retien-

A.D. 1659. droit non seulement Drontheim, mais aussi Bornholm : mais le roy de Suede auroit pour cela le fief de Bahuys 10 navires de guerre, & 2000 soldats, item le bien des gentilhommes en Schonen contre une piece d'argent.

Le susdit agent a porté aussi aux ambassadeurs de Dennemarc leur resolution, portant commission au Sieur Huygens, offrant la conference, qu'ils auroient demain, nisi causa.

Le Sieur Cojet ira à Amsterdam.

Les deputés des admirautés ne sont pas encore venus.

Jeudy, le 15. Jan.

L'agent de Heyde, ayant veu le Sieur ambassadeur de Thou par autre occasion, a rapporté, que derechef son excellence avoit fait mention du messager, qui l'avoit affronté, & qu'il desiroit satisfaction. On a prins mal cela, croyant luy avoir satisfait plus qu'assez. Les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc, veu le Sieur president, notifiant leur desir de venir en conference plus expresse, qu'ils estoient icy à grand fraix, que le temps s'en alloit, le Sieur Huygens & autres ont déclaré là-dessus d'estre prest, si qu'apparemment demain ils l'auront.

Des admirautés n'est comparu personne, que celui Tarlinge.

Des estats de Hollande aussi n'est encore venu personne.

L'abondance des vivres à Copenhagen est si grande, qu'on a resolu d'escrire au commis des vivres illec de vendre $\frac{1}{3}$ de sa provision.

Toutes les provinces ontourny leur quote dans les 800 mille francs, petitionnés pour le revictuaillement de Copenhagen, horsmis la Zelande.

Le Sieur Cojet, recevant sa response, avoit demandé à l'agent, si on luy donneroit bientôt une conference. Cela rapporté fust raillé, & dit, s'il avoit bien leu sa response, qu'à la fin il le trouveroit.

Le Sieur ministre d'Espagne a demandé, que le nombre des juges à la chambre my-partie soit complété de ce costé icy.

Vendredy, le 16. Jan.

Il est vray, que dans la response donnée au Sieur Cojet n'est pas mise la clause, que préliminairement il aye à expliquer les periodes de la proposition; Certorum hominum, &c. item quorum ausu, &c. mais l'on a trouvé à-propos de ne l'y inferer pas, ains d'en faire une resolution à-part, que dans la conference cela sera mis.

Les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc n'ont pas encore requis conference.

Il y a eu debat & conference avec le conseil d'estat touchant certains 5000 rix-dalers, que le Sieur Vogelsangh a escrit avoir besoin, sans dire à quel propos, en quoi on n'a pas voulu consentir, au moins pas encore. Sur l'estat de guerre de même qu'on forme à present, il y a eu des contestations.

LE samedi septième jour du present mois de Fevrier, le Sieur Milet sous gouverneur de Monf. le duc d'Anjou, fût envoyé de la part du roy à Monf. le comte de Dona, avec lettre de creance de Monf. le cardinal, & luy dit, que sa majesté desiroit estre maitre de l'affaire d'Orange, & qu'y ayant division entre les princesses pour raison de la tutelle du prince, c'estoit à luy à eu estre le legitime tuteur; & qu'en cette qualité Monsieur le comte de Dona eut à luy remettre la place. A quoy le dit Sieur comte respondit, que n'estant point dans Orange sous le serment sa majesté, mais sous celui de prince, qui luy en avoit comme la conservation & de la tutelle, qu'il avoit continué dans cet employ, il ne pouvoit donner aucune response à sa majesté qu'auparavant il n'en eut donné avis en Hollande à Madame la princesse douariere, & receu ses ordres, aux quels il se conformeroit; que pour cest effect il alloit depescher un courier. Et le dit Sieur Milet luy repartit, que sa majesté estant venué en Provence pour ceste affaire, aussi bien que pour celle de Marseille, elle n'en vouloit point sortir, qu'elle n'en eut veu la fin, qu'elle estoit presté d'empartir, & qu'elle avoit vint milles hommes pour forcer le Sieur comte de Dona, si il ne vouloit pas luy obéir: que le terme du retour du courier estoit bien long; & si l'ordre de Madame la princesse douagiere estoit de ne remettre pas la place, qu'est ce qu'il feroit. Le dit Sieur comte respondit, qu'il ne pouvoit que l'attendre, & que quand se vint mille hommes seroient sur bord du fosse de la citadelle d'Orange, il ne pourroit respondre autre chose. Le Sieur Milet luy repartit, qu'il estoit assez estrange, que luy seul dans l'Europe resistat aux volontés du roy, qui estant à ses portes, viendroit en personne se faire obéir. A quoy le dit Sieur comte ne repliqua, si non qu'on considerât à quoy son devoir l'obligeoit; & le lendemain dimanche che le dit Sieur Milet s'en retourna a la cour avec Monf. de Montaubon, que son eminence A.D. 1659.

luy avoit adjoint.

A paper of secretary Thurloc, relating to the post-office.

WHEREAS the honourable the committee for inspecting the treasuries required of me an account, as well of touching the rent of the post-office, as the sum of two thousand nine hundred ninety-nine pounds and five shillings and seven-pence, supposed to be lately received by me out of the exchequer, I do humbly offer this answer : Vol. lxvii.
P. 33.

I. As to the rent of the post-office, I have paid into the exchequer the full rent due for the said office upon the twenty-ninth of September last, according as I was ordered by the council of state, and have my discharges for the same, according to the course of the exchequer; and as for the profits of the office from the twenty-ninth of September to the twenty-fifth of December last, I humbly offer to consideration, that within less than a fortnight after the twenty-ninth of September last, my farm was, by virtue of an act of parliament dated the eleventh of October, made null and void, and the office itself, as it stood at that time, set aside, and consequently no more rent payable; and it was then lawful for any other person to set up other posts for the carrying of such letters as should be brought to them, which very many accordingly practised.

This made me once resolve to quit the office immediately; but having respect to the loss, that the commonwealth would sustain in that case, I continued things as they were till the twenty-fifth of December, carrying such letters as were freely brought to me; yet declaring, that I would not continue so to do any longer than the said twenty-fifth of December.

That the troubles and disorders, which were between the eleventh of October and the twenty-fifth of December, did both in England, Scotland, and Ireland, greatly lessen the profits of the office, the whole arising thereupon not being able to pay the charge, and answer the rent formerly reserved, by many hundred pounds, as will appear by certificate of those, who manage the office; and this loss ought not in justice to fall upon me, my farm, and the covenants therein, which were for my advantage, being made void, so that I can in law have no benefit by them; and therefore it will not, as I conceive, be thought reasonable to require a rent upon an avoided lease. But having no design to apply the profits to my own use, I set off a debt due to me from the state in lieu of the profits received, as aforesaid; which is the answer I give to the second question touching the 2999 l. 5 s. 7 d. supposed to be received by me. To which I say, I received not one penny of money out of the exchequer; but there being due to me from the state, expended for public services between the twentieth of January, 1658, and the twenty-ninth of September last, (and for which I formerly gave an account to the council of state before the parliament's last interruption) and for defalcations, according to the covenants in the lease in the post-office, the sum of 2999 l. 5 s. 7 d. I did give an acquittance in the exchequer as for so much received out of that receipt by me, and thereby discharged the state of that debt in such manner, as I can never demand or expect other satisfaction, detaining in my hands the value thereof out of the profits of the post-office as aforesaid, and am ready to give a just and true account of the profits of the office from the twenty-ninth of September to the twenty-fifth of December; and in case any thing shall appear to be in my hands over and above what is before expressed, I shall be ready to pay the same, a just allowance being also made for the management of the office during that time; and this, I hope, will not be denied, as well for the justice of the cases, as also because I improved that office 4000 l. per annum, to the state voluntarily, which I might have put in my own purse.

THE subscribed ambassador of the lords the states general of the United Netherlands hath received certain intelligence, that the free Hans-town of Lubeck hath prohibited and forbidden, (Hamburg intending to do it also) that their people and inhabitants should not pay in France the newly-imposed lastgelt or ship-money, exacted from all foreign ships and vessels lading or taking in any freight in the ports of that kingdom, in the same manner as is expressed in the proclamation of the said lords the states general, published in August last past, a copy whereof hath been communicated heretofore to their honours, to the end, that the like order might be given by and on the behalf of this commonwealth, the consequence of the said new and unreasonable burden being of no less prejudice and ill consequence to England than the United Netherlands and the Hans-towns.

The said subscribed ambassador beseecheth also, that he may have a favourable and positive answer concerning the articles for preventing of piracies; to the end, that commerce and navigation may be encouraged. Given this $\frac{7}{17}$ of February, 16 $\frac{5}{6}$.

THE subscribed ambassador of the lords the states general of the United Netherlands hath by his former papers at several times represented the most sincere intentions of the said lords his superiors, concerning the peace to be established by the joint mediation and co-operation of the three states, or at least of England and the United Netherlands, between the two Northern kings and kingdoms. And now on consideration, that the king of Sweden hath not only refused to accept of the proposals offered unto him by the public ministers of the said three states, according to the respective agreements made at the Hague, and the orders given to the plenipotentiaries of this commonwealth, and the extraordinary commissioners of the United Netherlands, during the last summer, but that he hath continued with his forces utterly to destroy and ruin the territories and islands of the king of Denmark; as also, that he hath still disturbed and obstructed since to the utmost of his power, the free commerce and navigation in the Sound and Baltic sea, to the great loss and prejudice as well of the people of this commonwealth, as of the state of the United Netherlands, who have both suffered by the continuance of the war in the said Eastern parts, whereby the mother trade of both nations hath been obstructed, and so unhappily interrupted; the said lords the states general have not been wanting to bestir themselves to the purpose, as well by their public ministers with the two high renowned kings, as otherwise; to the end, that the king of Sweden might have been persuaded to agree to the conditions propounded by the said three states, when the king of Denmark had declared both by word of mouth, and in writing under his hand and seal, his acceptance thereof: but seeing the king of Sweden did not only angrily reject the same, but that of late he hath in a project of a treaty propounded several impracticable and intolerable conditions, altogether differing from those, which by the said three states had been judged to be moderate and reasonable, (whereby it appears, that the more high-renowned king of Sweden hath no real intention to settle a peace in the said Eastern parts; not regarding the great charge and expence, which the war there hath brought upon the commonwealth of England, and on the state of the United Netherlands, beside the loss and inconveniency sustained during the war, by the people of both states, in their commerce and navigation in those parts) the said lords the states general have expressly ordered on the thirtieth of January last past, (when they were certified, that the present parliament was again re-established) that the subscribed ambassadors should assure their honours, that they the said lords the states general do truly and sincerely desire, that the aforesaid war may be accommodated and associated; intreating, that it may please the parliament the supreme authority of this commonwealth also to order, that by the common and joint co-operation the king of Sweden may may be brought to accept of the conditions expressed in the said former agreements; as A.D. 1659. also to refund the expences, which have been already supported, or may be hereafter occasioned by reason of his refusal and tergiversation. It is notorious, that the United Netherlands have been put to extraordinary costs and charges, since the king of Sweden's refusing of the aforesaid conditions, expressed in the aforesaid agreement; and that they have cause to demand satisfaction and refusal of the same from the king of Sweden; yet to shew their sincere and hearty affection to re-establish the peace between the high-renowned kings, they would be content to quit the same, if on consideration thereof surer and more favourable conditions might be obtained for the king of Denmark, which would certainly redound to the honour of both states, and much assure the liberty of the commerce and navigation in the Sound and East-India countries, for the comfort and welfare of the people of England and the United Netherlands. JE viens de recevoir la secunde lettre, qu'il a plu à V. S. de m'envoyer du 11a de ce mois, avec ce nouveau memoire de Madame la princesse douagiere, ma belle-mere. Je suis bien marrye de n'y pouvoir pas encore faire une responce precise, parce que j'attens tousjours ce qu'on m'en escrira de France, ou j'ay esté obligée d'avoir recours, estimant de ne pas rendre un petit service au prince mon fils, que celui de luy conserver les bonnes graces du roy très Chrestien, puisque le principauté est enclavée au milieu de son royaume, comme aussi croit faire la reyne Madame ma mere, en contribuant de son coté le credit, que sa naissance luy peut donner dans cette cour, à fin que dite principauté demeure à mon fils, avec les mesmes avantages & prerogatives, dont ont joui jusques à present ses predecesseurs. Ce sont-là que toutes les considerations & les soins de sa dite majesté Madame ma mere, & les miennes aboutissent, du quoy je puis asseurer vos seigneuries, & que je suis, SEING the tymes at home are so full of changes, your honour has bin very prudent in sequestering yourself from publik business. Somtymes 'tis better to be a spectator than an actor. Althoh this last scene has bin tumultuous, and full of troubles; yet, God be thanked, there has bin no bloodshed. By this tyme my lord Fleetwood and my lord Desborow may have seen their error in pulling down that government and family, which had bin a sure shield and buckler for their own greatness, as also for the liberty and safety of the whole nation; but that action will be repented of at leisure.

Althoh those places in the duchy of Milan taken by the French in these wars are restored to the Spaniards; yet 'tis believ'd by most in Italy, that the peace is neither cordial nor durable; but that each party does already begin to seek advantages against the other. I do believe, if the government were settled at home, England might have very good conditions of peace from Spain, and keep Donkirk still. But if our state has an inclination to part with Donkirk, I wish they would exchange it for Oran, a port of the Spaniards on the coast of Barbary near Argier, whereof the Spaniard makes no use at all; but to the English it would be very advantageous for many occasions, which I have formerly hinted unto your honour. We understand the Dutch are sending a fleet into these seas, consisting of 16 in 20 sail of men of war, and supposed, their design is to destroy the Alger men of war. I lately met with a book here, call'd the Antiquity of Tuscany, which is collected out of papers hid under ground above seventeen hundred yeares, now lately found and publish'd, which being full of very ancient curiosities, I thought it might be worth your honour's view. Wherefor I have desired my kinsman Mr. Parker to send you a book, the rather it being so suitable with the present state of our country; for kingly government was expell'd thence, and a commonwealth settled with much policy and prudence about the tyme of the Trojan war, in which state they continued about 800 yeares, till they were subdued by the Romans. The city, so often named Volterra, is still extant within 25 myles of this place, upon an exceeding high hill, which this author shewes to be built by Noah. If I er in troubling your more serious thoughts with this book, pray attribute it to the respects I owe, and the great esteem your wisdom and prudence has gained you with all men, especially with,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Your most faithful servant, prejudicial to that state, and not beneficial to ours, only to some particular men, which are takers and buyers; one under colour of a Swedish commission, which is indeed but a copy bought from another man; the other under colour of buying from the schippers at a supposed small rate, both which are very prejudicial, and will be more, if not speedily prevented. For if this compounding for and buying of ships be permitted, you will have here the sea full of Swedes commissions, (which is indeed but a copy that is here) and also of Portugal commissions. For no sooner is a ship taken, but one or other is buying of her, under pretence for the schipper; and small vessels will be set out, which need not go far to sea to take prizes, money being so ready for them; which is a great encouragement. For I hear, in the west country, some open boats are out only with nine men in them, moneys being so easily had for what they can catch. This man, Mr. John London, having already taken three or four, and compounded with all of them, one of them being here in this harbour, brought in the last night laden with wines and brandy, as they say. I think in my judgment a good course would be to send down a special warrant, to arrest the ship, the man of war, Mr. John London, and the pretended captain, which is a Frenchman, and the prize in the name of the owners, or my lord ambassador. Her name I know not, neither can I inquire her at present, the post being ready to go; but by the next you may expect it. But send down the warrant, before the ship be disposed of, and the frigate gone to sea, to do more mischief. There is also a states man of war with a fleet under his convoy, of Amsterdam, named Gillis Matysen Campen. In his voyage from Rochelle he hath retaken a ship, which was taken by a French man of war; and here are also pretended buyers of the ship, and much diligence is used to get the ship from him. They have also sent to London for a warrant to arrest the ship; so that I have advised the captain to wait, and go out of command, which he is now doing, as also to use force against all men, that shall by violence come aboard to make arrest upon the said ship. God send peace, and more trade, or else we are all undone, and must of necessity turn men of rogues, &c.

men: one of them he hath at present brought into this harbour laden with brandy and Graveswyne. The schipper's name is John Johnssen Leo, of Flushing. If there be not a present course taken with these, many more will be presently set out. The man of war hath a Swedish commission. The chief actor, Mr. John London, is at present in the city of London. If he can or may be found, and laid up, and an order sent down to arrest the prize man of war, and captain, by what name soever he shall be called, because every

MR. Love makes report, that according to the council's order he and Mr. Challoner had a conference this day with the lord Nieupoort, ambassador from the states general; and that they received from him several extracts of letters concerning Dutch ships taken by one captain London, on pretence of a Swedish commission, and sold in the ports of this commonwealth. Ordered, that the same be referred to the committee of the council, to whom the former papers exhibited by the said ambassador are referred, who are desired to consider of the whole affair, and to confer with the lord ambassador thereupon, and particularly upon the articles and proclamation for preventing of piracies, and to report their opinion to the council with the first opportunity.

Vol. lxvii.
p. 50.

LA Hollande a avisé, qu'il sera à-propos de faire au sieur Friquet ministre de sa M. Imperiale une réponse sur son dernier memoire, en termes fort civils; ainsi toutefois, que l'estat ne soit point engagé par-là en ce qu'il desire.

Copie de la creance du sieur Downing envoye extraordinaire d'Angleterre a esté veue; et est resolu, qu'à la veue de l'original d'icelle creance, on luy donnera audience; mais il ne se haste pas encore.

Pour la ville de Munster estant fait une nouvelle petition de 10 à 12 mille ryxdalers, et cela présenté à la Hollande, alle là simplement overgenoomen.

Lundy, 23. dito.

Le sieur ambassadeur de France a notifié, que la paix avec l'Espagne est publiée, quoyque l'on n'en fache pas encore tout le contenu. Puis a parlé de la paix au Nort; en a recommandé l'avancement; et qu'icelle faite, celle d'avec Bologne suivroit bien; et que pour cela on veuille venir en conference avec le sieur Downing, et luy pour achever la paix de Roschild, et sans cela, que la France employeroit les moyens, que Dieu et la nature luy auroit donné, &c. L'on a autorisé les deputés pour examiner cecy, et en faire rapport. Bref, ce que dit l'ambassadeur de France, ne convient pas avec ce que la Maire a escrit, ny avec ce que le sieur Friquet a dit.

La Hollande a avisé touchant Munster, qu'en doive préalablement escrire à l'evesque. La Hollande a recommandé l'equipage de 48 navires, ce que la Zelande a overgenoomen. Des 20,000 ou 29,000 ryxdalers pour la garnison de Copenhagen, n'a pas esté rien dit encore.

Sur un memoire du resident de Groot sera encore escrit aux estat d'Ostfrise de venir icy sur l'affaire de la defension.

Mardy, le 24. dito.

Le sieur Downing a fait sa proposition en Anglois, toutefois l'a donné en François un peu plus au gré de l'auditoire, comme insistant encore sur les concerts (h. e.) conventions de l'année passée. Toutefois on auroit bien aussi désiré, qu'il auroit fait mention de la paix en Prussie; cependant aura esté dit, que pas un membre de Hollande ne voudra escouter ou prester l'oreille à traiter icy, ains qu'il faille achever en Dennemarc; à quoy aussi les deputés de cest estat en Dennemarc par l'ordinaire d'aujourd'huy ont donnée assez bonne esperance.

L'on a fait dispute, et débatté l'affaire de l'equipage des 48 navires; ceux de Hollande le veulent faire sur le last et reilgelt. Ceux de Zelande veulent introduire les præmia et les cruyffers.

Vers la princeffe royale sont deputés les sieurs de Wimmenum et d'Amerongen le cas d'Orange.

L'on aura resolu touchant Portugal de ne traiter, que sur le fondement de l'instruction, que porteront les sieurs ten Hofe et de Witt il y a deux ans.

Mecredy,

Mecredy, le 25. dito.

C'est après dîner s'acheveroit de former et arrester l'instruction pour les sieurs de Wimmenum et d'Amerongen, à trouver la princesse royale. Pour le personnage, qui iroit vers le roy de France, on l'a remis à la disposition de la princesse douariere. Mais à bien considerer la lettre de la princesse royale, c'est celle-cy, qu'il croit affectionner mieux le bien de son fils que celle-là. A.D. 1659.

La Zelande a faite instance touchant la responce, qu'on donnera à l'ambassadeur de France.

L'on se tient piqué de passage dans la proposition du sieur Downing, ou il parle de tel roy des roys du Nort, qui a adheré à cest estat en la guerre d'Angleterre, reconnoissant bien, que c'est une retorsion sur ce qui est dit dans la responce donnée au sieur Cojet, que la Suede n'a pas adherée à cest estat durant la dite guerre.

Jeudy, le 26. dito.

L'ambassadeur de France a présenté un memoire cy-joynte en faveur du sieur Morus.

Quant au different entre les princesses d'Orange, il se fait ouverture d'accorde, la royale offrant de ne vouloir pas avoir le lord Jermyn; et la douariere offre de rapeller le comte de Dona; si que le sieur Gent, Swaneborg, et Stavenisse iront voir la princesse douariere, pour savoir, si encore elle desire le voyage de sieur de Wimmenum et d'Amerongen.

Touchant Munster, sont arrestées des lettres à l'evesque; mais il fera encore parlé aux deputés du conseil d'estat.

La dispute d'entre la Hollande et Zelande n'est pas encore finie touchant le last et veylgelt, et les premies des cruyssers.

Des affaires du Nort, ny des propositions de François et Anglois, ne se parle pas encore.

Vendredy, 27. dito.

L'on a encore eu beaucoup de debat touchant l'equipage de 48 navires; mais encore sans conclusion. Ceux de Zelande l'attachent tousjours à leurs cruyssers; qu'ils veulent avoir mis en mer. L'on écrira aux admirautés pour venir icy là-dessus.

Il y a eu un memoire du sieur ministre d'Espagne, pour et sur l'interim d'Outre-Meuse.

Quant au sieur Cojet, l'on a mis son memoire entre les mains des deputés pour ces affaires, sans aucune apparence de venir avec luy en conference.

A paper of the Swedish commissioners to the most illustrious council of state of England. Most humbly.

Most Illustrious and most Excellent LORDS,

IT cannot seem improper for us to recall into the memories of this honourable council, with Vol. lxiii. how great care and circumspection from the very beginning of the friendship happily p. 27. closing between the two kingdoms, it was provided, that no remora or scruple at all might remain hereafter in minds so well reconciled. For whereas our subjects complained, that they were not equally dealt with, and rewarded for the good offices done to this most glorious commonwealth in the late war betwixt England and the Netherlands by the command of our crown, which even then did exceedingly favour the advantages of England, whilst that very many of their ships of most huge value, some bound directly hither, others following, as their business and convenience led them, according to the law of nations, the harmless freedom of commerce through those seas, were by the men of war of this state in hostile manner taken, ransacked, most notoriously misused, and to the irreparable damage of their affairs detained half a year for the most part, nay some, one, two, or three years longer, insomuch as neither yet are they all restored, although long since absolved by the sentences of the judges after an hearing on both sides, the rest being in the mean time after the aforesaid vexations set free slowly, upon the continual supplications of our ministers both ordinary and extraordinary sent hither ever and anon to that purpose: For this cause, I say, and presently in the first confederacy made betwixt these kingdoms four years since at Upsall, after it was abundantly provided against all injuries hereafter to be feared from the subjects of each state, to wit, that the authors of such injuries, unless upon admonition they amended their fault, should be accounted as public enemies, and being delivered up into the power of the commonwealth, beside a just and plenary satisfaction to be made, should be most deservedly punished immediately after, and even in the same paragraph the restitution of ships comes next to that former caution; and satisfaction as soon as possible, and without delay, to be made to the party aggrieved for loss and damages lost and received in the said war; which satisfaction is tied into the restitution by the copula-

A.D. 1659. tive particle, as not to be divided from it, and necessary following. And afterward in the second confederacy renewed with our embassador a year and a half ago at Westminster, whereas for the most part satisfaction was given as to the first part of the former agreement concerning the restitution of the ships, that which remained behind, to wit, the making good of damages sustained upon that occasion, was more articulately concluded and determined. That three commissioners constituted on both sides, consulting together thereupon, should make an estimate and indifferent judgment of those things, that (which only was intended, and which both parts most desired; they are the very words of the confederacy) satisfaction might be given to the party injured according to what is good and right, 2. Summarily; 3. Without any appeal; 4. Without forms of law; 5. Without delay; 6. Fully and really. Excellent words indeed, and conditions most proper for increasing of mutual good will betwixt friends and confederate states. Hither therefore, most illustrious lords, (which hath been the cause of so large a repetition) we have desired, that your commissioners deputed according to the confederacy for this purpose might be called as to the very aim of their commission, from which, as we have by ours understood, when whether by mistake, or on set purpose, they swerved something far indeed, modestly had their recourse to your most illustrious judgment, though to the very great detriment of our affairs, as who do reckon not only days, but even hours, and daily buy that hope at a very high rate. And whereas the streightness of our term can scarce suffer the loss of one day, they indulge to themselves some weeks, that because this commission is now protracted unto a second year, they may seem to put years instead of months, or to be willing to do so; which they neither ought nor had need to do, if they had stuck to the forementioned conditions with that sincerity, which is fitting, and had sufficiently put off those personages, which heretofore they acted, while they pleaded privately those causes in private judicature, whereas now they bear the public character of performers of covenants solemnly agreed upon betwixt two most friendly kingdoms. Which nature verily those causes have so far taken upon them for the reasons before alleged, that they neither can nor ought any longer to be accounted as private business; whence they might easily have gathered, that no other answer would be given them by this most illustrious council, as neither indeed could there be given any other, than that which is conformable to the most express words of the confederacies, and unto their own decree. But they, (as we have heard) though much against the will of law and right, have a mind, that the sentences heretofore given in the causes of those ships should be placed as the rule of their commission; and because that were tolerable, they desire so far to extend them beyond their nature, that because those sentences pronounce the ships to have been detained upon just cause, that therefore they neither think, that those, which are to be restored ought to be restored, although already freed by those same instances, and are so far from allowing any thing to our men by the way of interest for the ships already restored, that they pretend that even the lucrum cessans, or gain, which might have been made by detaining them wholly there, may with justice be exacted from us; unto which end it is said, that a paper is offered already of contrary damages by an unheard of example, pretended upon our very own ships, which are already freed, which in earnest it is wonderful how it could ever enter into the minds of men endowed with so much prudence and experience (as their other actions witness). For although the authority of things once judged be very great, yet were they never of so great moment, that they could prejudice any after-covenant or transaction whatsoever, although made amongst the most private persons; but rather they receive their limitation from that which follows according to the very order of nature, which requires, as it is in a most known canon, that the latter law should derogate or take off from the former. Much less therefore can any former private sentences detract from a law so public, and so solemnly conceived; for whereas this doth bind the kingdoms themselves, it ought deservedly to be more valued than all the laws in the code of Justinian, especially seeing it doth explain our business more particularly, and expressly enjoins satisfaction of charges and of damages received. Concerning which again is that frequent maxim of law, that special laws do derogate or take off the authority of laws general. What need we therefore conjectures in a thing so evident? For whereas they say, that if our people had desired any thing further than the restoring of their ships, they should have put in their appeal, seeing in those sentences no mention is made of satisfaction of charges, by their leave, it is sufficient, that such satisfaction is not there denied, seeing by equal reason even thereupon it seems included. For that argument is very strong in law, which is called and taken from the contrary sense. And besides, that indeed was a very good and sufficient appeal, which both our ministers then here made unto your most illustrious council. As to which the examining of these things properly belonged, and that which our subjects worn out with charges and vexatious suits made to our king himself upon that occasion, who also most deservedly took into our consideration those their just complaints in the making up of the confederacy with his most serene ferent highness, so that they both did therein give an ultimate and most definitive sentence A.D. 1659. in this affair, concerning which so much as to dispute, is in the law called sacrilege. But besides, we shall prove, that the very sentences themselves do not very much favour this their opinion. For let us grant, that they all lean upon this clause, that they were detained upon just cause: We do not dispute that justice, what or how great soever it was; but cannot two just things concur and oppose one another? and hath not that, which is just, the appearance of unjust in respect of that, which is more just? In which almost the whole practice of lawyers consists. For seldom do men come to decide betwixt what is just and unjust, which even the unlearned can do; but of two just things, which is the most just; of two unjust things, which is the most unjust. Therefore, if they were detained upon a just cause, whether shall they not seem released upon a cause more just? for otherwise they would not have been restored. For, if they say, that they were unjustly restored, and that they would have the sentences so far repealed, they are not to be heard, because beside an unworthy counting of what they did themselves, they desire to have those things recalled, which long since have past over into the nature of a thing judged and decided; which in a law is accounted impossible: so that it cannot be believed, that these things are said in earnest, unless it be done for protraction of time, and wearying out the patience of our men. They do better, who say, that the restitution of ships was not made according to the highest rigour of the law, which is often called the highest injustice, but according to what is good and equitable. For they indeed express the very nature of the business. For the emperors do admonish, that in all things more consideration is to be had of equity and justice than of strict law, l. 8. c. de judicis; where (which deserves much notice), justice is diametrically opposed to strict law. And this, if at any time, is certainly most true in those judgments and contracts bonæ fidei, as they call them, that is, upon confidence of the honesty of each party; wherein, as the lawyer saith, it is unfitting to dispute concerning the titles of law; and among such kind of contracts society hath even the highest place, which, as Ulpian saith, hath a certain resemblance of brotherhood. But what are public confederacies, but the ties and societies of kingdoms, what but a most brotherly brotherhood? Wherefore, seeing in all things it is first inquired what is done before what is law, because the consent of the contractors gives law to the contracts, and their meaning is preferred before all subtilty of words, nay before the writings themselves; seeing, as it is usually said, laws are written, not in words, but in things; that form most prudently by you prescribed for the handling of those causes, that they should be finished according to that, which is good and equitable without the fashions of law, because you say, that both parties do chiefly desire it, is by us respected and venerated as the public law of the nations, and in it we all of us do with very much reason rest satisfied. For, that we may add this one thing, if equity persuaded the restoring of the ships, shall not the same persuade to repay the charges, when those two points are inseparably conjoined, that he who denies the one, seemeth to deny both of them? But what private person shall dare to divide and separate those things, which the kingdoms themselves have solemnly joined together, when neither is it lawful for either of the kingdoms so to do it against the consent of the other? Insomuch that absolutely either this must be stood to, or else the intention of our princes must be made elusory or deceitful, the very thought of any such thing being, as we believe, punishable, and coming within the reach of treason. Therefore we do again and again desire, that those very honest men may be admonished of that public office, which they bear herein, that they may not confound it with private brabbles, or cast in such anxious scruples of law into a most clear cause abounding with good belief, and so weary themselves and us with fruitless labour; but that they would only intend this, which the confederacy saith, that both parts do intend. And we do so much more earnestly now request it, by how much the loss of most precious time is more expensive to us, who in the multiplied charges of so many years have almost spent more upon this business, than can be hoped from it. And it had been much better for very many of our men, reduced to extreme poverty in this time, if they had known this from the beginning, which is now spoken. Although we for all that do never more despair of the high equity of our causes, that notwithstanding does with reason afflict us; that whereas now the time of the second agreement is almost slipped away, we are yet sticking in the very beginnings of the business; so that if we be obliged to agree the third time upon a new term, verily we are afraid, lest the world should think we do but jest in a thing so earnest, and that we had a mind with such laborious machinations to effect nothing. The most perfect judgment of this most illustrious council, and their zeal so often shewn for the conservation and increasing of the Swedish amity, do in no case suffer us to doubt, but that you will praise us this piety with which we do prosecute the common business of both kingdoms, and especially this affair of so great moment. And though otherwise we are even confident, that your illustriousnesses would do all these things upon your own accord, notwithstanding the matter seemed to us of such moment, that we also

A.D. 1659. also thought it necessary to satisfy ourselves thus far in disburdening our own consciences. We consecrate our senses to you most devoutly. From our lodgings, 7th January, 16⁵⁹/₆₀.

Your most illustrious LORDSHIPS

Most humble servants,

GEORGE FLEETWOOD,
JOHAN FRIDERICK.
VON FRIESENDORFF.

A letter of intelligence.

SIR,

Vol. lxvii.
p. 67.

YOURS of the 17th current I have received, which brought me verie acceptable newes, that you have spoken to the gentleman, (you know who I meane) and that he desires me to continue to write the intelligence weekly to him, and that it shall turne to accompt for the time to come. I owe you many thanks for haveing been mindefull of me; and I dare trust you, that care shall be taken thereof. Sir, you may be sure, that I never shall faile to continue my writing weekly to the sayd gentelman, having your intimation of the command of the sayd gentleman to me. I perceive by your last letter to me of the 17th current, that my letters to you of the 7th current were not come on yet at London, when your post departed, in which I had enclosed a letter for the sayd gentleman, with a paper in Latin of concernment. It seemes our posts come on there, as long as some of yours doe here. I have since the 7th of February continued everie post to write to you, and to the sayd gentelman. You are to receive of the 7th, of the 14th, and of the 21st February. I hope before this time they will be arrived. Sir, you desire also in the letter to know of me, if there be any other place then now, where I am, where I thinke I might be more serviceable to the state of England, I should give you notice of. I have hereupon examined severall parts of Europe, where the interest of England lyes; and so much as I have studied it, I finde, that the citty of Danzig is at present the place, where I might be more serviceable to the state of England than here, because the treatie betwixt the Pole and the Suede is held there at a place called Oliva, a cloyster a mile onely from Danzig, where severall embassaders and publick ministers are met together for to take care of the interest of their masters. I beleeve England hath his interest likewise in the sayd treatie at Danzig (which I forbear to remonstrate, being well enough knowne to the gentelman without me). If the gentelman please to command me to goe thether, lett him freely dispose of me. I shall be at any time ready to obey his commands; and when his directions come to my hands, I shall make all haste and speed for to goe thether, where and when he shall command me; but whether it be better to be sent thether with a publike character, or without it, I leave that wholly to the gentelman his owne consideration; yet if I should be sent thether privately, it will be necessary to have a pass in Latin from the sayd gentelman, under such a name and seal, as he shall thinke fitt, for to passe with more security to the place of treatie; and that in the sayd passe mention might be made of a businesse committed to me without naming it, I finde would not be amisse. But this I write onely to you, without any prejudice to you or any other. I referr this and other particulars touching this buynesse to the great wisdom and large experience of the sayd gentelman; and I am very willing to obeserve exactly with much respect the commands of the same gentelman. I believe, if I be commanded to goe thither, or somewhere elce, I shall have some generall heads sett up for my secret instruction, and moneyes ordered for the journey accordingly. I pray, Sir, be pleased to acquainte the gentelman of all I have written to you, or to shew him my letter. I have intimated these my thoughts to you at large, because I would not be troublesome to the gentelman with such a prolix letter as this. I have here enclosed a letter to the gentelman from me containing the newes from these parts. Be pleased, Sir, to have it carefully delivered. For newes I referr you to the prints herewith enclosed. Thus I am

Your friend and servant,

Hamburg, the 28th of February,
1660. [N. S.]

DE LAWERIN.

There is no great delay to be made for sending me to Danzig, because the treatie there goes on currantly; and if this journey be found to be of no great concernment for England, I am readie for any other journey, where the gentelman shall please to command me to goe to.

By

By letters from Danzig we have, that the Suede hath wrought out a still-stand for 20 yeares with the Pole. The Roman emperour, Dane, and Brandenburger are much disappointed of their aymes, being they stood so hard against peace, but a still-stand they could not hinder. This newes will make the Dane hasten his peace also with the Suede; and then the Suede will be able enough to oppose the Roman emperour. There will be a hot warr in Germany, if the peace with the Dane and the Pole be concluded.

The Danes have a dessein to besiege the strong castell Tonningen, where the duke of Holstein resides at present. They are much discontent with him.

I forgot in my letter to mention France or Flandres, where I may be likewise serviceable to the state of England.

A declaration of the lord Broghill, and the officers of the army of Ireland, in the province of Munster.

AS the freedom of parliaments is their undoubted right, so are our utmost endeavours for restoring them unto and preserving them in their freedom our undoubted duty. Our interest also is involved in our duty; and if we truly love that, we cannot decline this, since whosoever inquires into the foundations of his own freedom, his posterity's, and his country's, in a free and full parliament, as in a common centre, will find them all to meet. And therefore he, that is not free in his representative, has little reason to hope he shall be so in his person or property. The theory of this truth hath not been more believed by other nations, than the practice of it hath been sadly felt by ours. For ever since the first violence, which was put upon the authority of parliament in 1648, we have been without foundation, it having cost us more blood and treasure to maintain confusions, than ever it did cost any former age to free itself out of them. For whilst we are fighting for our properties and liberties, we have even almost in our successes lost both; and whilst we contended for reformation in religion, we have almost lost the very being and life of it, more heresies and schisms being introduced, whilst the highest light was pretended to, than ever the darkest times were involved in. And whilst we seemingly aspired to perfectness, we actually lost that charity, which is the bond of it, becoming thereby a reproach to ourselves, and a derision to that Protestant part of the world, unto which, whilst our supreme authority was inviolated, we were a bulwark; the universities and schools of learning in our nations having been looked more after to poison them than to keep them sound, that not only our streams might be impure, but even our fountains. Many have been employed to teach, who stood in need to be taught; and the legal maintenance of the ministry of the gospel conferred on men unable, unwilling, or unfit to dispense it, who had less ill deserved a maintenance for their silence, than their speaking. Never greater taxes raised for the armies and fleets, and never fleets and armies more in arrear. Taxes and impositions laid, which past ages never knew, and many thousand families of the present have been beggared by. Powers have made laws, and subsequent powers disowned and nulled what the preceding powers had acted; that now the questions are not so many, what is the meaning of the law, as what is a law; whereby that is become a subject of debate, which formerly was a rule for ending of it. All which are yet inseparable effects of such a cause; for whilst an authority itself is disputed, their acts will always be the like; and whilst many are unrepresented in making of laws, few will be satisfied to be obliged by them. And what is enacted by any but a full and free parliament, will always be questioned, if not repealed, when such an one doth sit. Nor can it be believed, that the laws of a parliament, the very much greater part of whose members are kept out without impeachment or trial, will ever pass the test of a free parliament, lest thereby they should encourage others to serve them in like kind. These sad miseries and these certain truths made us believe we hazarded more in submitting to that force, that was so lately over us, than in taking up arms to oppose it, and thereby endeavouring the restoration of the parliament's authority; in which God was pleased so to own the duty of our endeavours, that in a few days we were not only at unity among ourselves, but even able and willing to offer our assistance to our brethren in England and Scotland, which had it been needed, it had been as readily sent as offered. But we must confess, we could hardly so much as imagine, that those members, which had so recently felt, and justly exclaimed against, a force upon themselves, would, when it was taken off, have denied their brethren to participate in that right they saw the three nations had engaged their all to restore them unto. If it be a justice to declare for the restoring of some parliament members under a force, it is a greater justice to appear for the restoring of all, that are

A.D. 1659. under it; yea, as much as the whole is preferable to a part, so much greater is the duty of this declaring than of that. We were more than hopeful, that when the cause ceased, the effect would do the like; and when the rebellious part of the army was broken, those members would have been readmitted, which hitherto we were made believe were kept out only by it. The happiness of the new members restoration, and of the suppressing of those forces, which lately had interrupted them, would not have been greater, than the honour they would have acquired in making those other members, which had participated with them in their sufferings, to have also participated in their restitution. We were loth by an address of that nature to have lessened the beauty of their expected performance; and had rather have enjoyed the right and happiness of having this parliament full and free, as the product of the justice of this present house, than as any effect of our solicitations.

When the violence was put upon the parliament in 1648. we did with much contentment observe, how solicitous those, that sat, were to have it taken off, thereby asserting their rights, though they were denied the actual enjoyment of them; which made us the more cheerfully engage ourselves to restore those to the power of doing justice, who then manifested they wanted not the will; it being a crime too great to enter into our beliefs, that they asked, because they were sure to be denied, and would approve, when they had the power, what they condemned, when they had not the power; which, though then objected against them by many, we did not then credit; and we wish we never since had cause to believe. Nor was it unobservable, that though such members of theirs, as have been lately put out of the house by them, as Sir Henry Vane, and others, were known to be guilty of joining with that rebellious part of the army, yet they admitted them to sit in the house, till particular charges were brought in against every one of them; they heard and judged by the house. If such be not the true and ancient manner of proceeding against members of parliament, why was it practised to those so deeply guilty? And, if it be, why is it denied to others, who have not hitherto appeared to be so? Doubtless such as were kept out of the house by a rebellious part of the army, merited at least as much favour and justice, as those who joined with it. We do the more deplore such a procedure, because from it pleas have been raised for the like violence acted on the members now sitting; and happy are those, who condemn not themselves in the things, which they allow.

What more pregnant proofs need there be of the want of those worthy patriots so long excluded, who with the earliest stood in the gap for our liberties and properties, than that petitioning to the parliament is now punished as a high crime in the people, which at the parliament's first meeting was declared to be their undoubted right? And though a constant experience hath taught us, that the people may lawfully petition for repealing an act of parliament, which is grievous to them, and therefore much more against a vote, which is so; yet to our trouble and amazement we understand those worthy and eminent persons, who in obedience to their country's desires presented petitions for the restoration of the excluded members, an imprisonment in the tower was their answer; that, we again say, which was declared the right of the people, being now become their transgression. Is it not high time to declare for that justice, which, when petitioned for, is punished? And because we know the common aspersion to such a declaration is, that it favours of a design of introducing the common enemy, we shall here set down some of those many grounds, which make us experience, that in the duty we now engage in, we are not to be frightened by such words. It may indeed terrify and dare others; but such, who mean what they say, and are satisfied in what they do, will only pity those, who therein believe what they speak, and contemn those, who therein speak what they do not believe. We rather doubt, that if the house be kept so empty as it is, it will admit the common enemy, than the house so filled; for whilst eight parts of ten of the people are unrepresented, and two nations of the three intirely, may not it too probably provoke those people to join with whoever will promise them their right, than lie under that power, which hath hitherto denied it to them? To keep out most of the members, that a few may keep him out, is to do evil, that good may come thereof. We love to do lawful things lawfully.

That the house ought to be fuller than now it is, seems of late to be the granted opinion of the members, that now sit in it; and that we conceive can no way so probably with safety be effected, as by admitting all those, who in the year 1648. and since were excluded, those being likeliest to take care of our safeties and settlements, by whose authority our actings were influenced during the greatest heat of our wars; and therefore in interest as well as justice will be most concerned for us. And when such are admitted, there will be no fear, that the necessary qualifications for those additional members to be futurely elected, to supply the vacancies of delinquent and dead members, will be disobeyed, being enacted by so unquestionable an authority; nor that those then chosen can be able to over-vote so full a house, were that as much their design, as it is far from our thoughts to have so unworthy a belief of them.

We

We believe, under submission, that we have acted and fought against the pretended A.D. 1659 king, as long as any others; and therefore ought to apprehend his coming in as much as any others. But through the mercy of God, our principle is not to act an evil of ourselves, to secure the doubts of some, that our supreme authority else would commit one. We are not to speak nor think evil of the rulers of our people, nor out of the fear of an uncertain ill to decline a certain duty.

If the said excluded members be readmitted, they must be either the greater or the lesser number in the house: if the lesser, where is the danger of their admission? if the greater, where is the justice of their exclusion? For then it will appear, that the minor number keeps out the major. And if in the apprehension, that a parliament, when full and free, will abuse their authority, it be a received maxim to keep them from the exercise of it; a certain foundation is laid for all, that have the greatest force, to have also the greatest authority: and whoever hath strength, and this tenet together, may too easily be persuaded to believe, that he hath as much right over the minor part of a parliament, as the minor part has over the major. Neither can any act of a supreme authority be so evil, as is the admitting, that any but the supreme authority ought practically to judge what is best for the nations. The one can be but an ill act in governors, but the other is a destroying all government. We do not desire, that any of the secluded members, if they have offended, may not be tried; but we humbly desire, that they may have a parliamentary trial: and though we much value their persons, yet we can with as much truth aver, we ask this for their cause, not for them; and had those members, who now sit, been in the condition of the excluded members, and the excluded members in their condition, we had as cheerfully appeared for these, as now we do for those.

And considering that in past ages, and more particularly since the beginning of the late horrid rebellion in Ireland, our brethren in England have abundantly manifested a tender and compassionate sense of the condition of Ireland, and were careful to receive us in our lowest estate, as bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh; which we do and shall ever acknowledge with humble thankfulness, and (as a debt, which we well know to be due from us to them, above all people in the world) shall be for ever as tender of their happiness and welfare, as of our own, which indeed is involved in theirs, and without whom Ireland cannot be happy. We therefore remaining constant in the reasons of our brethrens declaration of the 14th of December, 1659, for adhering to the parliament, in defence of its privileges, and the just rights and liberties of these nations; all which we see now are apparently more and more violated by the non-admission of the said excluded members, and by not filling the vacant places, whereby the house might be full, and, being freed from force, might uninterruptedly act according to their judgments and consciences, towards resettling these nations, which otherwise in all human probability can never be restored to peace and tranquillity; we do therefore declare for a full and free parliament in England, consisting not only of those, that sat on the 11th of Oct. 1659, but also of all such of the members of parliament imprisoned, excluded, or withdrawn in December, 1648, as are yet living, who we desire may be restored to the freedom and liberty of their sitting and acting, according to the trusts committed to them by the several counties and places, which did chuse them; that so they may be no longer debarred from discharging their said trusts; and that vacant places may be speedily supplied by the free and due elections of the people, yet so as none of the persons to be admitted or elected be any of those, who have been in arms, or otherwise aiding, abetting, or assisting the late king or his son in the late war against the parliament, or that have put rebellious violence upon the parliament; and that the house so filled may proceed unanimously to consult the best means for resettling the peace of the nations, the re-establishment of true religion, (the surest foundation, as of all government, so of all the happiness of a nation) the fundamental laws of the land, (whereby all mens rights and liberties are preserved) and the liberties and freedom of the people, which are supported by those laws.

And for these ends, and in discharge of our duty to God and our country, we do resolve (by the blessing of almighty God) to join with all our brethren in England, Ireland, and Scotland, who have or shall join with us for the ends aforesaid; and do resolve, for the maintenance and preservation thereof, to hazard our lives and estates, and all that is dear to us. And we doubt not, but all our brethren in the said nations, who disdain to be made slaves, will join with us herein, as being with wisdom and reason desirous to deliver over to their posterity that liberty and freedom, which was conveyed to them at so dear a rate by our ancestors. And then we trust, that by the great mercy of God will speedily follow a happy settlement of these yet miserable and distracted nations; and consequently, that the true Protestant religion, in the power and purity thereof, may be established; the godly, learned, and orthodox ministers of the gospel maintained by their tythes and other their accustomed rights, their persons supported and countenanced, the universities and all other seminaries of learning cherished, heresies and schisms suppressed, needless impositions and taxes on the people removed, and no charge to be laid on

A.D.1659. on any of the nations, without their own free consents, given by their representatives in their severall and respective parliaments; manufactures and public trade and commerce at home and abroad advanced, justice in its due and wonted course administred, the just debts of the nation satisfied, the treasure and revenues thereof preserved and returned to their right and proper chanel, the arrears of the army and other public debts duly satisfied, the armies and forces continued in due obedience to the supreme authority, and not presume, as some have done, to give laws thereunto, which hath been the root of a great part of our miseries; the nations enriched, united, and strengthened; the reformed Protestant churches abroad supported and countenanced; the honour of the English nations restored, to the comfort of friends, and terror of enemies; the plantation of Ireland, in the hands of adventurers, and soldiers, and other English Protestants, advanced, as a further accession of honour and greatness to the English nation; and so, by the blessing of God, all will shortly terminate in the glory of God, the peace and tranquillity of these nations, the strengthening them against foreign invasion and intestine rebellion, and the comfort, contentment, and satisfaction of all the good people in these nations.

Intelligence sent from Holland by resident Downing.

From Monsieur Haren from Copenhagen.

21. Feb. 1660. [N. S.]

Vol. lxvii.
p. 71.

I FIND myself obliged to advertise your lordships, that I have not signed the letter, which my colleagues sent you that day, because in my particular I could not consent to the preventing of the project, which they there speak of, finding nothing thereof in the orders contained in the resolution of the 3d of October last, and your letter of the same date. For altho' the senators Vrop and Reets have formerly declared, that the declaration of the 4. Sept. was thrown aside and unprofitable, as we have made mention with more circumstances in one of the 13th of Jan. last; yet his majesty of Denmark hath not been wanting to make known to some of my colleagues roundly upon the 13th instant, that his intention never was to revoke it absolutely; that the words of the said senators ought not to be understood, as if it had been annulled; but that it was null and rendered unprofitable, seeing, that for want of a like declaration on the Swedes part, that was not obtained, which this kingdom principally desired, viz. a good peace. Also that they were the same day at the lodgings of the ministers, to tell him, in the name of his majesty, that he was in no way intended to revoke it, but to leave it in its force and vigour: which declaration, in my opinion, ought to have contented us without pressing upon another project, (of which I never had the reading nor communication) a second declaration on that side, which in nothing could contain more than the former, whereby whereby the king of Denmark embraces all, that the conventions of the Hague comprehend; and that therefore the king of Sweden ought yet to repair the damages, according to the said letter and resolution of the 3d of Oct. in regard there is no difficulty but on his part; and not having as yet received the conditions of them, he is the true cause why the peace hath not been brought to its conclusion. A.D. 1659.

From Van Honaert, at Dantzick.

3d of March, 1660. [N. S.]

Having upon the 25th Feb. given you notice of the conditions of the treaties of peace between the two parties, I know not how there hath been some alteration, or at least they do not go forward, as I am told, but rather go backwards; seeing that the Swedes had again demanded a great sum of money for the charges of the war, which the Poles took so ill, that they came presently back again to this city, whence they had gone the day before towards Struys; but the true reasons were, to enter into secret council with the king, as they have done several times, it not being possible to know what passes there, which is contrary to the humour of this nation, which used to be more frank; so that it is impossible for me to send to your lordships the certainty of it; and the rather, in regard the commissioners of Poland give me no knowledge of it, which cannot but confirm the suspicion, which is had thereof. However I have not been wanting to put forward very seriously, and upon all occasions, the desire of your lordships, in relation to the affairs of Denmark, to make them be approved; and I spoke yesterday to the king himself upon the whole matter; but his majesty did not engage himself in it, nor in the matter of the Protestant religion, for the protecting and maintaining of it in the kingdom; praying me to make a little memorial, comprehending their points in writing, which I promised to do with all speed, and I hope I shall obtain a favourable answer thereupon. His majesty added farther, that I might send them sealed by some of my people, without coming myself to bring them; whereby it may be seen clearly, that the matter of them is not too pleasing; and that he doth not willingly listen to them, nor the queen neither, who excuseth herself therefrom. The city of Dantzick is much inclined to favour the intentions of your lordships; and one of their burgomasters told me, that their deputies have express orders therein; but that the worst is, they will have little credit at court. It's talked, that the ambassadors of the emperor have orders to accept the peace, when Poland hath concluded it. I cannot yet learn, that the commissioners of Sweden have orders to receive the mediation of your lordships, notwithstanding the letters, which they have had from the king their master. Mr. Lombres hath not spoke to me a good while hereof, and those of Poland take no care of, nor use any endeavour in it, as being a thing indifferent unto them; so that to my great grief I can do no great service to your honour here. They speak of sending a minister to France, but he is not yet named.

After the writing hereof, the envoy of Nieubourg sent me word, that he was yesterday at Sappol, with the commissioners of Sweden; and that he understood by them, that if they did desist from demanding moneys for the payment of the garisons and the jurisdiction of Roses in Livonia, the peace should be concluded in 24 hours; farther adding, that perhaps more might be learnt this week.

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Samedy, le 28. de Feb. 1660. [N. S.]

DERECHEF il y a eu conference sur les affaires de Munster; le sieur Vander Hooge, Vol. lxvii.] Berer, d'Amerongen, & le tresorier y ayant esté adjoints; & au sieur Friquet ne sera P. 83. que fait ou donné notification; mais à l'evesque & à la ville sera escrit serieusement; & autant, & plus que ne porte le concept, étant notifié à l'ambassadeur de Portugal, qu'on persiste en la demande, qu'on a fait au roy à Lisbon, par les sieurs ten Hove & de Witt. Le dit ambassadeur a demandé conference cest après-dîner. Toutefois l'on remarque, que l'Angleterre s'en veut meller, & favoriser à ce qu'au Portugal icy l'on ne soit pas trop rigoureux, ny que si precisement en leurs demande des terres.

Le memoire de l'ambassadeur de France touchant Morus est mis en mains de ceux des eglises Walonnes en ce pais-cy. L'affaire de l'equipage est encore accroché à la pretension des Cruysers de Zelande. Toutefois par provision est arresté l'equipage: & sont ceux de l'admirauté convoqués à venir icy au plustost.

Lundy, le 1. Mars.

De l'affaire de Munster est fait rapport, et de la lettre, qui seroit écrite à l'evesque de Munster; mais la Hollande mesme & d'autres n'ont pas voulu condescendre à la faire

A.D. 1659. aller avec la clause comminatoire, de peur que cela ne rendent l'estat inutile à la mediation. Toutefois l'on persiste en la dimission & declaration de l'an 1658, & par provision le conseil d'estat parlera aux deputés touchant l'argent, qu'on leur fourniroit; à quelle condition ils le prendroient.

Samedy passé ce furent les deputés de cest estat, qui demanderent conference; & icelle accordée par l'ambassadeur, on luy a dit la declaration de cest estat, qu'on desire la paix sur les conditions presentées il y a deux ans par les sieurs ten Hove & de Witt à Lisbon. Et sur cela l'ambassadeur a promis de respondre. De Copenhagen n'a rien esté. Tant les Danois que Suedois ici nient ce, que les deputés de cest estat ont escrit de la grande apparence de paix.

Mardy, le 2. dito.

Les ambassadeurs extraordinaires de Dennemarc ont derechef présenté une memoire assez longue, contenant les raisons iteratives, pourquoy il importe, que leur roy soit aidé à r'avoir ou à reconquerir Schone, &c. & specialement ils concluent pour avoir les 20 ryx-dollars par mois pour la garnison de Copenhagen.

Le sieur Coyet a veu le sieur president, & a tasché encore à l'induire, à ce qu'icy on voulusse entrer en conference avec luy, pour trouver la paix; mais le president l'a fort renvoyé vers Zelande, assurant, qu'icy on ne fera rien en ces choses.

L'affaire de l'interim du paix d'Outre-Meuse encore & derechef est mis en mains du conseil d'estat.

L'on accommodera la ville de Munster de 10 mille ryx-dollars.

Icy fera arrivé tel colonel Veltbrugge, de la part du duc de Neuperg, ayant je ne sçay quel adresse aux deputés de Munster.

Mecredy, le 3. dito.

Il y a eu derechef deliberation sur les affaires de Munster. L'intention ou proposition du conseil d'estat est proprement de fournir à la ville cent mille francs; mais par provision ce ne sera que 25 mille francs; sur quoy le conseil a advisé plus expressement aujourd'huy; avissant, que la ville en payera quatre par cent, & promettra de ne s'engager pas ailleurs sans le sçeu ou aveu de l'estat.

Quant à la lettre à escrire à l'evesque est differé, jusqu'à samedi prochain, pour l'arrester.

L'on prendra ces 10,000 ryx-dollars des 800,000 francs, qui sont cy-devant consenty pour l'Ost.

La princesse royale aura agréé l'accord provisionel; mais l'on craint que le roy de France ne l'aura pas pour cela de vouloir le chateau d'Orange en ses pattes; & aucuns disent, que cela dechargera le prince de 60,000 francs par an, que luy couste ce chateau.

Jeudy, le 4. dito.

Le sieur Boreel a esté en l'assemblée; ou il a discoursu de la paix, qu'à Brusselles, & dans le Pais-bas, ils sont mal-satisfait de ce que le roy a quité à la France tant de pais & tant de belles places, laissant le reste presque depourveu de frontiers & defension.

Puis a discoursu du lastgelt, & des pratiques, que les marchands appliquent en cela; item de l'huile de baleine, &c. Sur quoy & autres il a requis particuliere conference.

Cest après-dîner il y aura conference avec les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc, qui demandent fort de l'argent, & subside pour leur subsistance.

Les Anglois parlent mal de ce que le roy de France a abandonné si totalement le Portugal. L'on tient, que par l'article secret l'Espagne aye promis tout le Pais-bas à la France, en cas que faute vint du prince d'Espagne.

Vendredy, le 5. dito.

On a fait rapport de la conference tenue avec les ambassadeurs extraordinaires de Dennemarc; qui ont singulierement insisté sur les 20,000 ryx-dalers par mois, provisionnellement pour trois mois, montant à cent cinquante mille francs. Et à cela les provinces ont comme presté l'oreille; quoyque pleinement cela n'a pas esté encore conclu, estant toujours l'esperance, que le pais se fera au nord. Cest affaire est encore renvoyé au conseil d'estat.

Le droffard Ittersum a escrit, que 6 compagnies Espagnoles estoient arrivées au paix de Roleduc, disants, qu'elles alloient vers le pais de Munster.

L'ambassadeur Boreel aura fort discoursu du grand revenu du roy de France, que cela desja monte à 72 millions par an; que dans peu on le feroit monter à plus de cens millions, que de 40 millions il en depenseroit, & espargneroit le reste.

Pour Orange on est en peine, n'estant de deux ordinaires rien passé de-là.

Les estats de Hollande, par placart, ont dispensé de serment, (de ne pas frauder) que l'année passée ils avoient imposé pour la tendresse de consciences d'aucuns, tellement, qu'icy on a des tendres consciences, aussy bien qu'en Angleterre.

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

SIR,

TILL the coming of this post we were here filled with news from Bruffels, that the lord A.D. 1659.
Monck had declared for a free parliament, and without abjuration to the king, or oath to the commonwealth; but the post coming in, we were otherwise informed; and yet Nieuport

Vol. lxvii.
p. 85.

186 writes, that a man can write of affairs with no certainty; that all is floating; and though at present all be settled and established, yet within three hours a man must write quite otherwise. In effect, we see very well, that it is not enough to have taken away the monarchical government, for every body afterwards might have the chief direction, which is in effect to be king; as elsewhere and ordinarily it is said among the ministers, men have taken away the pope, but every minister doth desire to have the direction, that is, to be pope. The lord Lambert had lately done so well, dissipating the insurrection of Booth; others likewise; but what doth doing well signify, unless a man persevere? Men know how to overcome others, but not themselves. Every body laughs at the lord Fleetwood and Disbrowe. In short we laugh at all. Those gentlemen seem to have been drunk with their fortune, dulci fortuna ebrii. Wise and prudent men know, that it is a mere folly, yea a madness, to be at difference; and that the greatest states of the world crumble to dust through civil dissensions; yet there is hardly one, that will yield a little to preserve the whole.

The king of Sweden is more fool than the English, if he believes, that any great good states general Denmark, emperor, can come to him from thence; and as well 104 as 142, 143, &c. are also fools, if they fear, that any great harm or hindrance can happen to them from the English. And I know not what the 125 will do here; for he knows not, to whom he is. And thus they speak here after this manner; but si resipiscant, si præteritus amor redit, all will go to the contrary: they will belye what they have spoken, and all that they have prophesied.

For the king of Sweden there is nothing better than to make peace; and what demonstration of kindness soever France makes for him, it is nothing. France indeed doth desire, that Sweden should raise itself with the depression of Austria, but not with the depression of Denmark. And England shews sufficiently, that they are of the same opinion; and, besides that, England is not in a condition. There is likelihood, that it will do something for Portugal; but however in se divisa.

The embassy towards France and Spain doth advance; they will look upon England as at a distance, or in a map. I am

Your most humble servant.

An extract of a letter written the 5th of March, (stylo novo) from Bruffels.

ON tuesday last the marquis of Caracena went to the Scots king, by the commands of Vol. lxvii.
the court of Spain, to assure him of all possible assistance towards the recovery of his right, and delivered to him and the duke of York their packets. That of the Dutch contained a letter from the court of Spain, to offer him the charge of high admiral of all his fleet, both in the Indies and Europe; to have the disposition of 1000 landmen, in order to the king of Spain's service: and wheresoever he lands in any of the king of Spain's dominions, to command in chief. Every of these particulars are very certain, and hath filled these parts with admiration. My lord Jermyn and Crofts are come to Bruffels this morning with such proposals, as will certainly bring a war into England, if not seasonably prevented by the prudence of the future parliament.

FROM Marseilles we hear, that the king hath ordered, that all provinces shall contribute towards the charges of the citadel there to be built; that six ships of war at Toulon would be speedily ready; and that they are to come into the western seas, to join

A.D. 1659. with those in Bretagne: that the cardinal hath resolved to make France more powerful and formidable by sea; for this purpose also 24 galleys are building. They are debating of a new tax again upon all strangers ships trading in France: that the king hath absolutely resolved to be master of the castle of Orange; and in case the governors refuse him, to force it by a siege: 4000 men are ordered to approach the city. His majesty hath declared himself guardian of the prince of Orange, in regard of the estate, which he hath in France. The clergy press it much under divers pretences; and it is alleged, that it will be advantageous to the young prince, who, by the demolishing of the castle, will be freed from the maintaining of the garison, which to no purpose consumeth more than the revenue of the principality. The king hath offered to content and protect the prince his kinsman in all his rights. The 3d instant went hence by post the lord Jermyn, with 17 gentlemen, all English, as well for the business of Orange, as the affairs of England.

In the river of Bordeaux there is not one vessel, by reason of the new tax, which much damageth the trade in those parts, if no Holland ship come. Much discourse there is, that the prince of Condé, after the death of the present king of Poland, shall succeed him; also that in France there will be made a grand marshal to exercise the place of constable.

Vol. lxvii.
p. 129.

THIS day we expect the lord Jermyn, Crofts, and Mr. Montagu, who bring much good news with them from the French court to the king of the Scots: you shall have the particulars by the next. From Spain this week is presented a patent to the duke of York, which intitles him prince of the sea, and captain general of all the land-forces in the Spanish fleet, and high admiral of his navy in Andalusia, giving him full power in all parts.

We hear, that Monck is joined in appearance with the city, and hath written a severe letter to the parliament; but it's believed here to be nothing but a disguise; and that he intends not the calling of a free parliament; and that if he hath no design for himself, he will keep to the present parliament. The Spanish, French, and Hollanders augment their courtship to the king of Scots. A good sum of money is already paid in Madrid for his use, and the bills of exchange will shortly be here: he is at present much indebted here, but that will discharge his debts with overplus. The Spaniards in these countries are not hasty in publishing the peace, the greater part of them not being at all pleased with it. The Spaniard will press very hard upon the Portugal this summer; and in appearance Lisbon itself may run some danger. Whether the French will assist the Swede, as they make some shew, a little time will make visible. The prince of Condé, who is highly courted at Paris by all the French nobility, made his first visit to the queen with great expression of his zeal to serve the king of Scots; and the cardinal's nieces have been of late observed to make their visits far more frequently than formerly they have done. I hear there hath been an English vessel made prize by the duke of York's commission, and carried into Brest in Bretagne. If the French permit that, it is no sign they will continue long in amity with us; and what the French and Spaniards together may do, taking advantage of your distractions, is much to be doubted.

Your, &c.

Postscript,

You know with what reality and cordiality I have served Mr. secretary Scot and my lord Fleetwood. Had I had timely supplies, I had been capable of doing much more. I perceive money is so extreme scarce with you, that I have thoughts of returning back to England speedily: but above all keep my name secret. My life lies at stake.

MR. SPEAKER,

Vol. lxvii.
p. 82.

WE have within these two days heard the certain news of your being restored unto the exercise of your trust, and the reassuming the government; which we will rather congratulate with the three nations than with you, since they are to receive the benefit of all your labours and counsels. God hath done great things by you, and given us reason to hope for all good things from you. The experience of what we have seen, and received,

A.D. 1659.

received, gives us a very unmoved assurance, that you will ever continue in that good and glorious path, in which you have hitherto walked; and not to take rest unto yourself, until the people under you may rest in liberty and safety. Having been for these last months far from you, we have not been able to give any other testimonies of our desires to serve you, than by our diligence in the work here, which you had committed unto our care; and in that we have not yet been so successful as we have desired. The difficulties are great in reconciling various interests. The king of Sweden hath, until of late, shewed reluctance unto the peace we have proposed unto him: within these few weeks he hath seemed to be of a gentler temper, and we believe, in a short time, all the difficulties on that side would have been removed, when it pleased God, by a fever, to put an end to his life, on the 12th of this month; by which we are fallen into new difficulties, and have sent this bearer, our secretary, to desire your orders how to behave ourselves in them. We have good grounds to be confident, that the queen regent and senate will readily, according to the orders received from the dying king, embrace the conditions, that have been proposed, some little things being altered, which may be as much for the Danes advantage as theirs. But if you should consent to the solicitations of the states of Holland, in changing the conditions agreed at the Hague, as we hear they will endeavour to persuade you, we do not know how great difficulties will arise, nor how long the conclusion may be retarded. The dead king did ever say he valued your friendship above any states or princes in the world. His friends and servants hope you will continue unto this infant king, and his mother, the same friendship, which you have shewed unto him; and the protection of them hath something of noble and generous in it, besides the concernment of England, which is nearly interested in the preservation of the crown of Sweden, which is now in danger to be broken, and those to get the pieces, who will make use of them to your prejudice; which inconveniency may be, in a great measure, avoided, by keeping the United Provinces to these agreements, from which they cannot recede, but by your consent. We have made a full relation unto the council of the state of affairs here, and our proceedings in them, who are

Your most faithful and obedient servants,

A letter of intelligence from the Hâgue.

Samedy, le 6. Mars, 1660. [N. S.]

ENCORE & derechef on a esté dans le travail de former l'instruction pour l'ambassade de France, dans laquelle besoin aussi est assumé & prins le sieur ambassadeur Boreel. Et spécialement est on dans la conformation d'un concept pour une nouvelle alliance, & pour encore, avec la France seule, au lieu que cy-devant on l'a voulu faire avec la France & l'Angleterre ensemble; mais, si l'Angleterre se remet en posture, on parlera aussi Anglois.

L'on a resolu d'escrire une lettre arraisonnée au roy de France, en faveur de l'affaire d'Orange, pour laquelle place on est en peine, n'en ayant pas eu des lettres en deux ordinaires.

La besoigne pour l'instruction pour ambassade de l'Espagne, on n'a pas encore fait commencement.

Vander Honerd escript, que pour la paix en Prussie avec la Pologne il, ya grande apparence.

Le 8. dito.

Le sieur d'Ommeren a fait rapport d'avoir parlé avec ceux du conseil d'estat, qu'on donnera ces 10,000 ryxdalers à ceux de Munster sur certaine obligation, dont le formulaire contient, que la ville payera 4 par cent. 2. Qu'elle ne s'engagera par traité à aucun prince estrange: ce que demain seroit communiqué aux deputés.

L'on a derechef eu sur le tapis l'affaire d'Orange: on écrira aussi une lettre à la princesse royale sur le même subject.

L'on a derechef besoigne sur l'instruction pour l'ambassade vers France. Incontinent après cela toutefois l'on formera aussi celle de vers Espagne. Après l'assemblée vint une lettre de l'ambassadeur Nieuport, contenant, que les membres seclus estoient rentrés dans le parlement, ayant choisy le sieur Monck pour general de l'armée, avec apparence que bien-tost se pourroit faire plus grand changement.

Le 9. dito.

L'on a fait une halte dans l'affaire de l'instruction pour France, à cause que l'assemblée de Hollande commence. L'instruction pour l'ambassade vers Espagne sera mutatis mutan-

A.D. 1659. dis, & en effet complimentaire, au lieu qu'en France on tachera de faire une alliance. Et d'autant que le sieur Boreel inculque icy tant le dessein de la France de bastir des navires, & d'augmenter le commerce, l'on conçoit beaucoup de jalousie, & sur tout de ce lastgelt, & assurement on tachera de rompre ce lastgelt par traité.

La Frise a proposée, que dans l'instruction influera, que les ambassadeurs seront justiciables de leurs actions devant la generalité, & renonceront le privilege de non evocando.

La Zelande a donnée à entendre, que cela leur plait aussi; mais la Hollande s'y oppose. Tant pour les 60,000 ryxdalers au Dennemarc, que pour les 10,000 ryxdalers à la ville de Munster, n'est encore rien de final fait; la Hollande l'ayant overgenoomen pour la proximité de leur assemblée.

De Prusse ni de Copenhagen n'est rien venu.

L'assemblée de Hollande demeure encore defectueuse, car ceux de Nort-Hollande ne sont pas venus.

Et l'affaire de France ou de l'instruction de même attend cela; quoyque cependant le sieur Boreel & raet-pensionnaire entre eux formeront & accommoderont quelques articles au present temps.

La nomination du personnage vers France dans l'affaire d'Orange fust proposé à ce matin. La Geldre proposa le sieur de Groot & Copes; la Hollande desiroit la surseoir jusque à l'assemblée de Hollande. L'Utrecht proposoit le sieur de Maasdam, & cela fust suivi par les autres provinces suivantes.

Le 11. dito.

Ceux de Munster, ayant fait difficulté & scrupule de s'obliger pour 10,000 ryxdalers, à ne pas pouvoir traiter avec aucun prince estrange, ont esté conseillé d'attendre, que l'estat declare la somme plus grande.

L'admirauté d'Amsterdam a escrit une lettre soigneuse touchant le payement, qui devra être prompte à l'arrivement des navires, qui sont attendu du Sont; item pour le fournissement des vivres pour la flotte de Ruyter; item pour l'equipage nouveau. Cela attende l'assemblée de Hollande. La dite assemblée est aujourd'huy remise jusques à mardy prochain. La Hollande a excusée la deputation du sieur de Maasdam vers France sur l'affaire d'Orange, & au lieu de luy est nommé le sieur Copes pensionnaire de Boisleduc, qui ira.

Il y a une lettre de la compagnie de West-Inde, contenant plainte, qu'un predateur François avec commission de Suede a prins un fort ou loge, & a pillé les Hollanders; sur quoy sera escrit au roy de France.

Le 12. Mars.

Le vice-admiral Egbert Meuwis, avec onze navires de guerre, & quantité des marchandises, est venu icy, a fait rapport en l'assemblée, que le 2. Mars il estoit parti du Sont. Il n'apporte point de lettres, mais de bouche dit avoir de la bouche du sieur de Slingelant, que le roy de Suede seroit mort le $\frac{2}{3}$. Feb. à Gottenborch d'une fièvre chaude. Des ambassadeurs de Dennemarc en ont aussi quelque lettre du secretaire du roy; mais ils en ont rien communiqué, en signe qu'ils ne le croient pas pour indubitable.

Le sieur Copes part demain avec la lettre au roy de France dans l'affaire d'Orange: il va avec un valet.

My LORD,

Hague, $\frac{2}{3}$. March, 1660.

Vol. lxvii.
p. 115.

MONDAY last brought hither, by an expresse from London, the newes of the happy union of the parliament, and the return of the members of parliament to the discharge of their trust, the which did exceedingly, at the first, surprise most of this country; yet the most serious amongst them, upon further thoughts, do say, that they look upon it as that, which hath in it a very great tendency to the composing of the many differences and solid settlement of affairs in England; and that whatever should be imposed upon the people of England by force, without their free and full consent, could not last; but that what shall be done with it, will have both strength at home, and reputation abroad. And assuredly the people of England in parliament assembled are the

the best and only proper judges of what is best for England; and it shall be my prayer, A.D. 1659. that it would please God to give them that spirit of wisdom and moderation, as is necessary, with regard both to their work, and to the season and manner of the carrying on thereof, and the many difficulties, which they are like to meet with upon every hand.

In mine, by the last post, I sent a copy of the points, upon which this present assembly of the states of Holland was called. Their assembly will be compleat about tuesday next, and then we shall quickly see what they will doe about the affairs of the north. The Imperiall, Brandenburg, and Danish ministers here doe still vehemently press them to declare themselves against any seperate treaty between Sweden and Denmark. On the other hand, Monsieur Cojet, envoye extraordinary of Sweden, intends to-morrow to demand audience in their assembly, to press them to declare themselves, that they will not give the Dane any farther assistance; and otherwise, that they must not expect to have from his master the ratification of the treaty of Elbing with its elucidations; but that he will from henceforward look upon himself as free from what he did promise at Elsnour, this winter, concerning that matter.

The French ambassador hath also orders to demand another audience, to push them to an agreement of those affairs, and that with the granting of an equivalent to the king of Sweden, instead of Dronthem; but the truth is, this state doe very little consider France in this business, for that they know they have noe shipping; but their eye is wholly upon England, whether you will further intermeddle in any kinde therein; and if they could but any way perswade themselves, that you would not, I do assure you, that this state would forthwith declare itself against any seperate peace between Sweeden and Denmark, without the inclusion of the emperour, king of Poland, and elector of Brandenburg; whereby the enemies of the king of Sweden will be so considerable, (having made such a league among themselves) as that he would expect little less then being confined within the rocks of Sweden; the consequence whereof must be, in relation to matters of religion, the be-reaving the Protestant cause of his support; and in relation to matters of trade, the giving this countrey the absolute monopoly and soveraignty thereof in the Baltique sea; the which is indeed the mistery of this countrey, that which imploies the great number of their seamen and shiping, and indeede is the grand foundation of all their other trades.

And they are heere the more enclined to a generall peace, in regard, that they see, that the king of Poland having put them to it, and finding, that they had not declared themselves, that they will not consent to any peace betweene Sweden and Denmarke without his inclusion, is now upon the very point (as is beleived) of concluding a peace with Sweden; and if that peace should be concluded with the inclusion of the emperor and elector of Brandenburg, then this countrey is left alone to uphold the Dane against the Swede; of which they will find a very hard task. And certainly, whether warr or peace doe continue, the interest of England is very highly considerable; and I doubt not, but that very serious reflection will be made thereupon.

There are 11 Dutch men of warr, with a greate flete of merchant-men, come to the Vlye from the Sound, who bring newes, that de Ruyter doth lye with 25 saile of men of warre before Landscronen; and that 6 or 8 more of his men of warr are gone to the Belt, to plye to and again there. And it is much doubted by the knowingest English merchants in this countrey, that they will trouble the trade of the English in those parts. Besides, they bring newes, that there are many capers about the Skage, whereof one hath above 30 guns, who lye there only to take English ships, that shall come that way upon the newes, that they have, that very great numbers of English shiping will be employed that way this summer. I have also certayne newes from Ostend, that there are about 12 men of warr ready to set to sea from thence, intending towards the Sound, to katch English merchants going that way. And truly they will make a fearfull havock of them, unless you shall please forthwith to take care for a sufficient convoy to those parts. I have this weeke written from Amsterdam, that there are 13 saile of English ships richly laden, and ready to sett sayle for the Sound; and the masters of them do earnestly desire, that in case any English men of warr should happen to come into this countrey, that I would order him to convoy them, and such other English ships, as are now ready in this countrey, into those parts. And however I have bin wont upon occasion to order such English men of warr, as come hither, to convoy such English ships as were ready; yet this being so far a voyage, I shall not adventure to do it without your particular order; onely give me leave to say, that the people of this countrey will be discouraged from hiring English shiping to those parts, upon the newes of the capers being gone that way, unless they can have assurance of their having convoy. And, on the other hand, if it were knowne, that I would, upon such occasions as this is, order them a convoy of such English men of warr, as do frequently arrive heere, there would hardly an English ship come into this countrey as long as their troubles shall continue in the Sound, but would forthwith have a freight thither proffered her; the which I thought it my duty to lay before you, it being now the first of the spring, and good time to give order therein; and that

A.D. 1659. that it hath been none of the least cares of all parliaments of England to encourage its shipping and navigation. And truly, (if I know any thing of this nature) that, which is the greatest foundation of the fishing trade of this countrey for herrings, is their trade in the Sound, where there is the greatest vent for them; and if England will ever get that trade to itself, it must be for encouraging, by all meanes possible, the merchants of England to trade to the Sound, which will as certainly begett and mainteyne to England a great fishing for salt herring, as its trade with Spayne principally begot and mainteyned its fishing for poor John in Newfoundland.

The letters this day from the north do farther confirm, that the present negotiation between Sweden and Poland is upon the very point of being concluded; and that, however the emperor and the elector of Brandenburg do their utmost to hinder it, yet, that if they cannot hinder it, they will consent to it, and be included in it; and if so, what if this countrey, seeing themselves not able with the Dane only to resist the king of Sweden, and considering that the king of Sweden hath consented to the treaty of Elbing with its elucidations, whereby they have their traffique secured, and a treaty defensive with him contra quoscunque, should forthwith declare their acquiescence in what the king of Sweden hath graunted to them, and so make their own peace? And it will be in their power to make the Dane in a moment submit to whatever they please; and so England, which was lately left out in the treaties betweene France and Spayne, shall be the onely countrey at a loss in those parts also. For what farther, I refer you to the enclosed, and am,

My LORD,

Your lordship's most obedient and humble servant,

G. DOWNING.

Since the writeing hereof, one vice-admiral Cortelis, who commanded the 11 men of warr of this state, which are come from the Sound, is come to this place, and hath been in the assembly of the states generall, and there made report, that Mons. Slinglant, one of the deputies of this state in Copenhagen, at his coming away, told him, that the French ambassador had just then given him notice, that the king of Sweden was dead at Gotenburg, but that he brings noe letters of it from any of the states deputies: which whether it came to pass in regard of any doubt they might have of the truth of the newes, or that they thought the post would bring it sooner, I know not; nor is there any other letter come of it, save onely one from some secretary at Copenhagen to the Daneish ambassador here. And this a newes of that moment, as is not to be given credit to, but upon very sure grounds.

LES nouvelles, que nous avons de la cour, portent, que le roy partit d'Aix le 2. pour aller coucher à Marseille, d'ou sa majesté ne devoit retourner à Aix que le 6. & en partir le 10. pour s'en aller à Tolose passer les festes, après lesquelles toute la cour partira pour St. Jean de Lus. Le roy d'Espagne a dit à Monsieur de Chouppes pour le rapporter au roy, qu'il partiroit de Madrit le 1. d'Avril, pour se rendre le plustost qu'il pourroit à Fontarabie. Ce Monsieur de Chouppes est de retour de Portugal, ou il estoit allé faire des propositions d'accommodement, que les Portuguais ont rejettées. Il est repassé par Madrit, & il est arrivé à la cour le 29. de Fevrier.

La citadelle de Marseille se bastist en assez grand diligence. L'on y a pendu en execution de l'arrest donné par la chambre du parlement d'Aix, qui y avoit esté envoyée, un des principaux seditieux, & un autre a esté envoyé aux galeres: quatre ont esté pendus en effigie, & plusieurs ont esté bannis. Le commerce de cette ville-là est entierement ruiné.

Monsieur le prince fit le 2. le serment de fidelité entre les mains de sa majesté pour le gouvernement de Languedoc; mais il n'aura aucune ville.

Monsieur le prince est tousjours icy, & il y passera les festes pour s'en aller après en Bourgogne; plusieurs personnes de condition l'ont magnifiquement traicté,

To the right honourable the council of state, appointed by authority of parliament.

THE lords the states general of the United Netherlands, perceiving that the king A.D. 1659. of Sweden doth still refuse to re-establish the peace with the king of Denmark, according to the respective treaties and agreements made and concluded at the Hague, on the 21st of May, the 24th of July, and the 4th of August, of the year 1659. last past, (all which treaties have been ratified and confirmed by the parliament of England) have ordered, that the subscribed embassador should desire, in their name, and on their behalfs, that, by the concurrence and co-operation of this commonwealth, the king of Sweden may be disposed to accommodate himself, on the conditions expressed in the said agreements, which have been tendered unto him by the public ministers of France, England, and the United Netherlands, in the said month of August last past; and that he, the renowned king of Sweden, having, since the time wherein it had been thought fit and convenient, that he should have admitted or accepted the said peace, when the king of Denmark had fully declared his acceptance thereof, according to the said agreements, continued still refusant, whereby the state of the United Netherlands hath been necessitated to support very great and extraordinary charges; the said lords the states general do conceive it just and reasonable, that the said costs and charges be refunded by the more high renowned king of Sweden; as also all further costs and expences, which shall be occasioned by his longer refusing of the said peace, on the conditions here before-mentioned, or, that left, on the condition of the said vast sums of money expended since the said refusal, and the utter devastation of the kingdom of Denmark, more sure favourable and equitable conditions may be granted to the said high renowned king of Denmark.

The subscribed embassador beseecheth further, that he may have a positive and final answer concerning the articles for preventing of priacies.

He intreateth also, that it may please the council of state to give him answer in writing, concerning the ship-money, or lastgelt, lately imposed in France on all foreign ships and vessels, that take in any lading in any of the ports of France.

And to the end, that he may communicate more circumstantially some particulars relating to the said affairs, and others, which are in the present conjuncture of times very considerable; the said embassador beseecheth, that a committee may be authorized to confer with him thereupon. Given this $\frac{2}{12}$. of March, 16 $\frac{59}{60}$.

SIR,

I HAVE received yours of the 24th of February, English style. To-morrow I am parting for Antwerp, whither the princess royal is going, being on her return for Breda. The king of Scots goes with her to Antwerp, and from thence returns speedily hither; but both the dukes go through with her to Breda. In my last I let you know, that the duke of York is made captain-general of all the king of Spain's land-forces at sea, and admiral of his fleets, commanding his cinque-ports. I told you likewise, that Montagu, Crofts, and Jermyn, were come from the French court with good news. Now, I can assure you,

A.D. 1659. you, that there is an agreement and articles drawn up between Mazarin and Charles Stuart; and Charles Stuart is speedily to marry Manchini (his niece); only several of his privy council (amongst others the chancellor) are very stiff against the speedy doing of it, until they shall see what the late changes in England will produce; for they allege, that if the king should now not only marry a Catholick, but also bring in a foreign force into England, it would not only cement the present divisions, but many, that are now his friends, would become his enemies; and so he would give a very great advantage to the sectarian party, whom they look upon as implacable enemies to all that line. In fine, it was thought the best advice to make a little pause, rather than be over-hasty in a matter of so great concernment.

This last scout reported, that Dunkirk was streightened by some forces drawn towards them, and that the duke of York was at the head of the said forces; but it is not true, for the forces are all in winter quarters; and the duke hath not been out of this town these six weeks.

This afternoon I peep'd into a letter of Hyde's to a gentleman of great quality in the west of England, in which was this passage (amongst many others):

"I am extreme sorry to hear, that Thurloe is again alike to get into employment, who knows so well the way of doing mischief; and who is, I am afraid, without any remorse for what he has already done."

But in this, and all things of this nature, I pray have a care of me. My life is nearly concerned in your keeping of secrecy. And, in the next, let me know what you would have me to do. To think to continue here without money, is but a vain thing; and how you can promise to yourself, or me, any settlement, in so many changes, I know not. If I must live upon you, pray let me come away by all means. I rest, &c.

The death of Minheer Hemstet is very much regretted here, who died lately at the Hague. The peace is published here on Thursday next, and there are preparations made for fire-works; and the joy is to continue three days.

Monsieur De Thou's proposition to the states general.

MY LORDS,

THREE weeks since, being in this assembly, I delivered a letter from the king my master, whose intentions I unfolded to your lordships; and acquainted you with the special directions I had received. So having in my discourse represented the state of affairs, and the importance of the thing, I prayed your lordships to deliberate upon, and afterwards to let me know your resolutions.

But not having receiv'd any answer, either in general or particular, from you, although I know, that governments of your form and constitution must needs act slow, yet your silence, in a business of this nature, is the cause why I am come again, not only to renew all the instances contained in his majesty's letter, but likewise in this juncture and crisis of the northern affairs, to make others; and so much the rather, because of the approaching campaign, to the end, you may come speedily to a resolution, and signify to both the kings the necessity of making a peace, and to give over all thoughts of continuing a war, by which you must needs give occasion of jealousy to all the princes and states of Europe.

I judge this, my lords, to be the fittest time to press this business in respect of the first meeting of the states of Holland; whereof, if I mistake not, here are many deputies at present, who may, by their presence and discourse, contribute very much to the persuading your lordships to resolutions befitting so important an affair, which will settle the commerce of the Baltic sea, so many years interrupted, and cause your subjects to enjoy the profits and advantages of the treaty of Elbing, and its elucidations; and, which is the most considerable, make peace throughout all Europe, and thereby give means to the princes in it of sending convenient aid to that illustrious commonwealth of Venice, which has, by a prodigious resolution and courage, resisted so many years an enemy, that is so potent and formidable to all the princes and states of Christendom.

The greatest difficulty in this peace of Denmark lies in the security, that the two kings demand mutually. Methinks, all the provisions for it, that can be expected from men, have been made by guaranty, that France, England, and this state, have promised; and the king my master has again ordered me to make new assurances, that he will endeavour to make jointly the said guarantee in the most sure, authentic, and solemn form, that the two kings can desire or imagine.

But as to the treaty, whereas the continuation of this war is grounded upon nothing but the pretences of either king, that the treaty of Roschild was not executed, which was made by the assistance of monsieur de Terlon, his majesty's ambassador, jointly with the the ambassador of England, his majesty cannot satisfy himself, till it be put in execution, A.D. 1659. and finished, according to the treaty, which was made here at the Hague, the 12th of last May following, which the two kings have agreed upon: the three considerable articles, which have respect to the interest of strangers, and the safety and freedom of commerce, so that there remains nothing but to consider, what satisfactions and exchanges may be made for the contentment of both kings; that the peace be more firm and safe for the future. But if they cannot agree, by referring themselves to the judgment of the mediation, or otherwise, his majesty resolves to insist upon the whole execution of the Roschild treaty, comprehending therein the three articles above-mentioned.

If, after all this, God, provoked by the crimes and sins of men, suffers not a conclusion of the peace upon this foundation, I have orders from the king my master to declare to your lordships, that he will not forsake the king of Sweden, and that crown, so long allied to him, but will relieve him with all his victorious forces, which are not lessened by one soldier, but are augmented by those, that his most serene highness the prince of Condé commanded; and will likewise assist him with all the treasures and revenues of his kingdom.

And his majesty finds himself obliged to make so high and advantageous a declaration, on behalf of his ally, out of principles of honour and generosity, and in acknowledgment of the constancy and fidelity of the alliance, that the crown of Sweden hath maintained with him, having never been shaken by fears and threats, neither moved by any promises, to quit his majesty in that difficult war of Germany, that it underwent faithfully and courageously with him, till the conclusion of the peace, that he jointly made with that crown at Munster and Osnabrug.

And they were the same principles of honour, generosity, and gratitude, that obliged his majesty to write to the ordinary deputation of the empire very effectually upon the infringement of the said treaties of Munster and Osnabrug, by the last invasion of Pomerania; upon which, I think, I ought to communicate to your lordships the letter, that the said deputation writ to the emperor, sending him his majesty's letter: By the letter of the deputation your lordships will easily understand, that the emperor will have an hard task to render ineffectual the instances of the princes of the empire, who invite him with so much respect and affection, and with so much equity, to put an end to the war in Pomerania, and to leave things in the same state they were before his forces invaded that country.

Wherefore, my lords, I intreat you, in the name of the king my master, to make a serious reflection, and to signify the consequences of it to the Danish ambassadors, that, by your sage and good advice, they take not false measures in so ticklish a juncture as this; but prevent the infallible evils, that the continuation of this war must necessarily occasion, if they are not ended speedily by the expedients, that are prepared for them.

Before I conclude, I am, by command of his majesty, to make a grievous complaint in his name of the instances and solicitations you caused to be made some time since, with great importunity, in England, and at Lubeck, to excite that considerable and potent nation, friend, and ally of his majesty, and the Hans-towns, which are also in alliance with him, against a certain composition of 50 sols upon a ton of foreign vessels, that load in France; which imposition is of very great consequence to his majesty, but of little or no charge to your subjects, who make so great and considerable profits in France, that they may be said to have all the trade there, as likewise almost all the fruit and emoluments.

My lords, you know very well, that every sovereign reserves to himself the liberty to make at home such laws as he thinks fit, and judges most to conduce to the weal of his state, and benefit of his subjects. Neither does his majesty complain, that you make at home placarts upon this occasion, (though perhaps fault might have been found with the terms, in which they are drawn) but to solicit his neighbours and allies, with intent to beget differences, and dissolve the knot of amity between them, which he infinitely prizes, and looks upon as a rampart and out-bulwark to his kingdom. This is what he cannot bear, and therefore acquaints you of his high resentment thereof, and declares to you by my mouth, that if directly, or indirectly, you go on to solicit England and Lubeck, as aforesaid, he says, he must look upon it as done to combine against this state, and will make your state feel the effects of his resentment and indignation all he can. But on the contrary, if you give him reasonable satisfaction upon both the points of this proposition, you may expect the same advantages and testimonies, that your fathers have had under the reign of the late kings of glorious and triumphant memory, father and grandfather of his majesty. And I do not doubt, my lords, but when you consider and weigh the power and greatness, that at present God has visibly poured upon his majesty, adjoined with all the outward and most eminent qualities and endowments in the flower and spring of his age, and without enemies, by the means of a most glorious peace, that he lately concluded, cemented, and consolidated, by an illustrious alliance, the whole royal family united to him, never to be separated from him, who is arming not new, but old troops, commanded by the famous

A.D. 1659. famous generals in the world, and by the most famous for their conduct and valour in Europe; who has, towards Spain, Italy, Germany, and the Low-countries, impregnable fortresses, and is also fortified with many alliances, that are very powerful and considerable; and that, which crowns the work, and which is the soul, and, as it were, the spirit, which gives motion and action to all those powers, he is assisted with so prudent, intelligent, and active counsel, that it gives his majesty power to make himself loved and sought after by all his allies and neighbours, and feared and dreaded by all those, that incline to be his enemies now, or at any time hereafter:

I say, my lords, that when you consider all these things, that might, doubtless, be much better depainted by one, that were more able and eloquent than I am; I am confident, that your lordships will have a care, for the time to come, of disgusting his majesty, as you have done some time since upon several occasions, that I will not particularize, it being neither suitable to the dignity of majesty, nor the discretion of his majesty, so to do; but on the contrary, that you will let slip no opportunity of giving him satisfaction and content; and that, by the like conduct, you will also instruct the extraordinary ambassadors, that you are sending to him, that they may obtain handsomely, and without difficulty, all that may be advantageous, safe, and tend to the strengthening of your state, and the renewing of the alliances, that have been so glorious and profitable to you. Here I'll end, praying you, that I may have a speedy and favourable answer to his majesty's letters, to my memorial of the 20th of the last, and to my two propositions. Done at the Hague, 16. March, 1660. [N. S.]

Brussels, 17. March, 1660. [N. S.]

Vol. lxvii.
p. 136.

IN pursuance of your H. and M. L. command and commission given to me, I departed from the Hague upon the 14th, and the next day got to Breda, where I delivered your H. and M. L. letter to the princess royal, who declared to be very well satisfied with your sending to the king of France in favour of the prince of Orange her son; and that his principality might be preserved to him and his successors, her highness shews great affection and resolution to assist your H. and M. L. in this their good intention, and to second me in my endeavours; giving me, to that end, a letter to the king of France, and another to the queen of Great Britain. Also it pleased her highness to recommend me to the lord Jermyn, who hath great knowledge of affairs, and may be serviceable to me in the court of France. Having received those letters that night, the next day I departed from Breda, and arrived here this day. Having spoken with the lord Jermyn, he hath undertaken to assist me in all that he is able in the court of France, whither I intend to go with all speed to effect your H. and M. L. orders, if it be possible.

Resolution of the states general.

Thursday, the 18th of March, 1660. [N. S.]

Vol. lxvii.
p. 147.

THE lord Bootsma, being president of the assembly, proposed to their H. and M. L. that the lords ambassadors of the king of Denmark had been at his lordship's lodging, and had complained to his lordship, how that the lords, their H. and M. L. commissioners extraordinary with the said king, had not yet received their H. and M. L. resolution of the 30th of January last, concerning the vigorous acting of the fleet and forces of this state against that of the king of Sweden.

Likewise, that the said ambassadors had desired, that their H. and M. L. would be pleased to resolve upon something concerning the moneys desired of this state by the said lords ambassadors to be sent to the king of Denmark, to supply his urging occasions. Whereupon being debated, it was resolved, that the lord van Amerongen should be desired to take the pains to go to the said lords ambassadors, and undeceive them; for that the said lords commissioners extraordinary in Denmark had signified, in their letter of the 15th instant, that they had received the said order or resolution of the 30th of January last.

To the second point, the provinces are desired to explain themselves.

To the right honourable the council of state.

*The humble remonstrance and petition of Elias Straufs, baron of A.D. 1659.
Trzebitch, and resident for the duke of Courland and Semigallia, now a prisoner in the Upper Bench,*

Vol. lxvii.
P. 143.

Sheweth,

THAT your humble petitioner was sent into England in the quality of public minister and resident for the duke of Courland, in the time of Oliver lord protector, and was not only owned as such by the late protector and his son, but also yet lately had a commission and letter from the said prince to this renowned commonwealth, which were delivered to the committee of safety (then sitting) by the hands of the lord Whitelocke, a member of that committee, and then keeper of the great seal; though to this day your petitioner never had any account of, or answer to the said letter. But it having pleased God unexpectedly to lay a most heavy and deplorable affliction (long since manifest to the world) upon your petitioner's said gracious prince and master, by reason whereof his highness hath been rendered incapable of supplying your humble petitioner with such sums of money, as were requisite for his subsistence in this country, where he is a stranger, your petitioner was unavoidably constrained to contract some (inconsiderable) debts, not exceeding all the sum of one hundred pounds sterling; for which moneys (notwithstanding) he was arrested, cast in prison, and by the cruelty of his barbarous creditors hath been kept now full six months in this place; where he must unavoidably perish, if not by your honours assured charitable and powerful assistance speedily relieved; for God and his whole house know, that during the last three months of this his deplorable imprisonment he hath been in a more calamitous condition than is expressible, having lived upon and subsisted merely by the charity of his fellow-prisoners, (for the most part little less distressed than himself) who yet for conscience and the honour of their country's sake (understanding him not only to be a stranger, but a public minister) as good Christians shewed so much compassion, as to relieve him with a meal's meat at some times, thereby keeping him from perishing, and hitherto with much ado preserving some small remnant of life in him, which yet is not like to last many days, (by reason of his great indisposition of body, occasioned by the said disconsolate and penurious life, which of late he hath been forced to lead) if he be not speedily released out of this woeful place.

Your petitioner therefore doth humbly and instantly pray this most honourable council, that your honours will be pleased to take his most deplorable and perishing condition into your favourable and pious consideration, and out of your renowned nobleness and Christian charity take some speedy course to relieve and succour your distressed petitioner in this his incomparable and inexpressible extremity.

And your petitioner, as in duty bound, shall for ever pray, &c.

A SHIP from Tunis came to Marseilles, and reported, that both Tunis and Algier, having heard of the peace between France and Spain, and that at Toulon there were great preparations for sea, they offered the redemption of 6 or 7000 French slaves, that were in those two cities. They speak of two embassadors from Tunis, to treat of a peace with France.

Monf. Mancini, nephew of the cardinal, was arrived at the court, and very well received under the title of duke de Nevers.

At Marseilles there will be maintained twelve galleys; twelve at Toulon for protecting the seas against pirates.

At Brest in Bretagne all ships were arrested by the treasurer Colbert, who bought two Holland ships, which he hath sent to Conquernan, with many seamen, whence they will go with two more ships of 300 tons each to Rochelle.

The twenty Holland ships convoyed by two men of war were come safe to the gulph of Lyons, and going for Italy. Some report, that the king had sent considerable forces to besiege the castle of Orange.

Here is expected Mr. Blomendael, extraordinary embassador of the elector of Brandenburg for Spain; and by the way he is to speak with the cardinal.

There is a design to increase the impositions and customs upon all strangers commodities brought in here, but principally the cloth and says; so that under this pretence there are more than 2000 balls of commodities and manufactures in the custom-houses of France there stopped, to the great prejudice of traffick.

IL y a eu une lettre de l'electeur de Brandenburg, contenant remerciement de ce que cest estat a si amiablement entrepris la defension de son pupille le prince d'Orange, avec admonition d'expedier au plus-tost celui, qu'on voudra envoyer, avec promesse, qu'il y enverra aussi le sien. Le sieur Copes, destiné vers là, a desiré encore, & aura lettres à la princesse royale, qu'il verra en passant, & d'elle prendre d'autres lettres aussi, tant au roy qu'à la reyne.

Le

Le sieur Cojet auroit aujourd'hui audience dans l'assemblée de Hollande sur les creden- A.D. 1659.
tielles du roy son maistre; mais elle ne se trouve point in forma, si qu'il a donné sa proposition par escrit sans prendre audience, étant disputé de sa reception.

Il y a eu lettres de Gottenburg du $\frac{27}{17}$. Fev. qui disent positivement, que le roy de Suede soit decédé le $\frac{13}{23}$. Fev. ayant aucunement disposé aux affaires de royaume.

Le 15. dito.

Le sieur ambassadeur de France a eu audience, & a harangué touchant la guerre au Nort, fort persuadant la paix; qu'autrement le roy son maistre seroit obligé d'assister celui de Suede de tout son pouvoir. Puis a parlé du last-gelt, taxant cest estat d'inciter & piquer aussi l'Angleterre à s'opposer contre cela. On l'a prins de lui par escrit.

Ceux de Hollande ont derechef urgé l'equipage; mais la Zelande demande les præmia pour leurs cruissers; & d'autres ne sont pas encore prest.

Les ministres de Dennemarc n'ont rien donné par escrit; mais de bouche en leurs visites ont dit, le temps estre trop chargé, & que l'Angleterre est fort; & qu'ils ne sauroient pas faire paix sur les conventions de la Hague.

Le 16. dito.

Entre autres lettres venues de Sont, il y a, que la paix s'approche fort. La satisfaction demandée par S. M. de Dennemarc estoit mis en arbitrage des mediateurs.

Derechef est venu l'affaire de Munster, & sont les provinces admonestés à recevoir & resoudre.

L'affaire de passage-gelt à Maestricht est aussi mis sur le tapis.

Le sieur Cojet donne à connoître dans sa proposition toute sorte de satisfaction touchant les elucidations des caperies, & tout, si avec lui on vient en conference; cela est mis es mains des commissaires.

Le 17. dito.

On a decouvert un navire de Suede chargé de fer, venu avec le dernier convoy du Sont; mais il y a dispute entre ceux d'Amsterdam & de Nort-Hollande, à qui fera la judicature, étant fait quelque empechement de l'un à l'autre à main armées.

L'affaire de Munster, à sçavoir de ce dix mille rixd. est en omvrage; la plus part on consenti; mais Rotterdam & quelque ville ou deux en Nort Hollande ont opiné, que dix mille rixd. est peu de chose, mais que ce ne seroit qu'un engagement & introduction à plus grande somme, si qu'il faudra encore avoir patience jusques à mardi.

A Ostende est prins un navire de Rotterdam, & parcequ'il y a un homme Anglois dessus cela, ils croient que c'est un navire Anglois; sur quoy sera escrit.

Le 18. dito.

Le college de l'admirauté d'Amsterdam a faite plainte sur divers points, en quoi l'admirauté du Nort quartier lui fait tort, tant touchant la reception des convoys & licentes, que touchant la jurisdiction aquatique, & specialement le fer Suedois, qu'on croit avoir attrappé.

Les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc ont par le sieur president de bouche fait rememorer leur expedition, specialement touchant les 150,000 francs, sur quoi les provinces sont admonestés.

Touchant l'equipage de 48 navires, les provinces de même ne sont pas encore d'accord.

Le 19. dito.

Il y a eu derechef debat sur l'equipage. Ceux de Hollande sont comparu en bon nombre dans l'assemblée, & ont specialement dit, que l'Angleterre equippoit soixante fregattes, que la France equippoit fort; que c'estoit une honté, que cest estat tardoit tant en cela; mais la Zelande parloit encore de leur cruissers. On verra demain.

Le sieur envoyé Downing a présenté memoire, & desire, que divers navires de sa nation étant en ce país ici, non-obstant l'ordre general interdisant la sortie des navires vers Oost devant le 20. Avril; la Hollande l'a overgenoomen.

Les electeurs du Ryn ont escrit & requis ici, que les vins du Haut-Ryn ne soyent pas ici chargé plus haut que le vin de Moselle; ce que la Hollande a aussi overgenoomen.

Le comte de Flodrof a obtenu quelque sorte de repressaille contre l'electeur de Cologne sur le payement d'une rente.

A letter of intelligence from Holland.

MONSIEUR,

A.D. 1659.

In the possession of the right honourable Philip Id. Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain.

IL semble bien, qu'à present les affaires en Angleterre se forment & se façonnent à quelque plus d'ordre & de repos ; ce sera le moyen de se rendre derechef un peu considerable en dehors ; autrement ici l'on n'estime pas les Anglois pour froids ni pour chauds ; hoc est, qu'ils ne pourront faire ni bien ni mal. Et pourtant les devoirs, que le sieur ambassadeur fait par de là contre la Suede & pour le Dennemarc, ils les font faire pro forma, non pro materia, comme présupposants, que d'Angleterre le Dennemarc ne doit attendre ni bien ni mal.

Mais la France est plus redoutable ; & l'on ne digere pas bien la façon de parler, dont a usé l'ambassadeur de Thou, étant une façon de menace ; & l'on croit, que ce ne sont pas que des paroles ; & que maintenant le roy de Suede étant mort, la France perdra le courage de beaucoup, entreprendre en Allemagne ; & au pis aller que l'on pourra opposer l'Espagne & l'Austriche à la France ; & que on la contraballancera aisément, & qu'aussi l'infante d'Espagne (fort habile & bien instruite) avec la reigne de France pourront bien tant sur l'esprit du roy, qu'il l'induiront à s'abstenir du secours pour la Suede. Et cependant ils croient, que l'ambassadeur parle fort clair, même avec aigreur ; ce qu'ils peuvent mal digerer, & y a des pensionnaires les plus habiles, qui travaillent à y répondre & à refuter le sieur ambassadeur ; mais la refutation verbale profite de peu. L'exécution de ce last-gelt est en la main du roy même ; & que feront les Anglois, ayants la même maxime ? Et si la France & l'Angleterre demeurent unis au Sond, & en ces traités du Nort, cest estat ne fera que s'espuiser & se ruiner sans aucun fruit : le fraiz, dommage, & perte de trafic est certain, l'evenement de la guerre incertaine.

L'equipage de 60 fregattes en Angleterre donne ici nouvelle jalousie. Je suis

Votre très-serviteur.

The memorial of Mr. Downing the English envoy in Holland to the states general.

Vol. lxvii.
p. 158.

THE under-written envoy extraordinary of England did not the last year trouble their lordships the states general of the United Provinces with any complaint, although many English ships were for a long time stopt in the ports of this country, to the great prejudice of the proprietors of them, for that there did appear something of a reason of state, which might give something of a shew of ground for the doing thereof ; viz. the great want of mariners for the fleet then going out : but being now informed, that there are at this time again a great number of English ships, which are stopped and hindered under great penalties from pursuing their intended voyages towards the havens of the friends and allies of England in the Sound ; and that this stop is to continue till the 20th of April next, in which time many of the said ships may possibly have made their voyage ; and seeing that the laying on of embargoes upon the ships of the friends of this state, which are in their harbours, is a thing of a very nice nature, and not to be practised but upon very extraordinary and important necessity, and that for as little time as is possible, and no such appearing at this time.

And as to what may be alleged, that no more is done to the ships of the people of the United Provinces, if this state for the pulling down of the prizes of the commodities of any of those countries, and making their own commodities more dear, think fit for some time to stop the going of their ships thither ; or if in this conjuncture of affairs, in regard to the danger of the seas, they do stop them for the providing of them with a good and sufficient convoy, that it is unjust and unwarrantable, for reasons of this nature to stop with them the ships of England.

The said envoy extraordinary doth therefore most earnestly demand, that the said embargo may forthwith be taken off the ships of England, and that they may be suffered to preserve their intended voyages towards the Baltic sea.

And the said extraordinary envoy cannot but also again make complaint to their lordships, that notwithstanding the many memorials, which he hath given, and the many resolutions, which he hath received thereupon, that yet to this day there is no satisfaction given to the proprietors of the goods of the ship called the Increase, or Bloom-pot of Hull, brought to Enchuyfen by a Flanders caper ; nor yet is the ship, called the Samuel of Burlington, restored to the proprietors by the admiralty at Rotterdam ; nor satisfaction made for the ship called the Love and Friendship, brought with her lading into Delffiel, and there unladen and sold by a Flanders caper, although the matter of fact in all these cases hath been most clearly made out, as is confessed.

And

And if it be objected, that these cases were before the placart of this state of the 7th A.D. 1659. of November, 1658, their lordships may consider, that that placart did not enact any new thing, but did only declare what ought before by the laws of nations to have been done to their friends and allies in such cases, as is set down in a letter of their lordships to the respective colleges of the admiralty upon this subject; and that a great number of ships have of late been restored in England to the people of the provinces, upon the bare foot of the law of nations, there being to this day no particular placart concerning this matter.

The said extraordinary envoy doth therefore once more solemnly demand, that justice may be done in the foresaid cases; protesting, that if upon the account of their happening before the publishing of the said placart satisfaction be not made, that the people of the United Provinces will for the future be treated in like manner in England, who may hereafter, until the publishing of some such placart, happen to be brought thither by commission of some foreign prince; and that the state of England will have very little encouragement to come to any agreement in writing about matters of this nature, if so little be made of the law of nations, and so long as they shall still be referred to the admiralty of this country: whereas in England remedy is given immediately by the state; and that the admiralty do take to themselves so great a liberty, as hitherto they have done, of vexing the people of England with endless delays and charges, so few getting any relief from them, the relief, which any do get, being with so much loss of time and expence, as that the charge commonly equals, if not surmounts the profit. Given at the Hague, 19. March, 1660. [N. S.]

Mr. Downing, envoy in Holland, to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

THIS last post I received one from you, and therein the welcome newes of your Vol. lxvii. being come again into publique employement, the which I assure you did exceedingly P. 157. revive and comfort me, not onely for my own sake, but for my countrey's sake; for that yourself, and none in England as yourself, doth know the scheme of our affaires abroad. I have heere inclosed myne to the president of the councill, and shall over and above the weekly account of the gross of publique affaires to him, give you a more particular account of what may not possibly be so fitt for a publique view. And thus I did this last yeare betweene the councill of state and Sir Henry Vane, giving the councill a general account of affairs, but writing to him that, which was matter of more secrefye: and thus Nieupoort doth weekly betweene the states generall and de Witt.

As for the present state of the negotiation between this countrey and Portugal, I have herein inclosed to you a copy of the proposition, which hath bin made by the ambassador of Portugal, which is now heere; to which this state hath answered, that they cannot be satisfied with, but do insist to have the lands in Brazil, which were taken from them, restored to them: nor do I see, that that peace is likely suddainly to be concluded, although they cannot deny, that Portugal is in great danger of being lost, and that the loss thereof may be of very ill consequence to this country.

The king of France his owning, the affairs of Sweden doth at this moment something ballance the noyse of the death of the king of Sweden; and I understand, that M. Bordeaux hath also orders to the like effect with those of M. de Thou. But were it not for the feare of England, notwithstanding France, this countrey would forthwith declare itself for a general peace, and enter into a league with the emperor, &c. against the king of Sweden: but upon those grounds they think it their best to be as silent as they can, their fleet being already in the Sound, and the spring coming on, which will give them advantage enough, if they can keep England from intermeddling, especially if they can be able to keep off the peace between England, and Sweden, and Poland, or at least that the emperor and elector of Brandenburg would not sufferr themselves to be comprehended therein. But the truth is, they have at this time very little credit in the court of Poland, and the Poles are very weary of that warr; so that unless the death of the king of Sweden make some alteration, that peace may probably by this time be concluded; and so far as I can gather, the emperor and elector doe the utmost to hinder it: yet if they cannot hinder it, they will be comprized in it; and then this state would have enough to do to uphold the Dane, and insensibly the traffique of those parts would fall into the hands of the English. I shall say no more of that business, because I doubt not but you will be particularly informed by the letters from col. Sidney and Sir Ro. Honnywood: only give me leave to say, that I very much wonder, that they doe not declare

It is said, the king of Spayne hath made the duke of York commander in cheif of all his fleets, and of all his sea-port towns, where he shall come; and that he shall go to Spayn to command a fleete, on board whereof shall be many souldiers, who, it is said, shall be made use of against Portugal. If you please to direct the letter to me as envoye extraordinary. Although the king of France presse here the peace between Swede and Denmark; yet also he presseth in Poland, if possible, the making of that peace before it; and that with the inclusion of the emperor, so as that he restore what he hath taken from the king of Sweden in Pomerania.

Vol. lxvii.

IN pursuance of an order of the council of the first of March instant, made upon the humble petition of Richard Bradshaw esq; late resident at Hamburgh, whereby it is referred to this committee to examine the whole matter of fact concerning his employments, disbursements, and allowances, and to report their opinions to the council; this committee having perused the accounts of the said Mr. Bradshaw, as also a copy of a privy

privy seal granted him by the late protector, bearing date the thirty-first day of January, A.D. 1659. 1658, wherein it appears, that there is due upon the said accounts, unto him the said Mr. Bradshaw, the sum of two thousand one hundred eighty-eight pounds eleven shillings and four-pence disbursed in the service of the commonwealth, over and above what moneys he hath already received :

Ordered,

That it be humbly reported to the council, as the opinion of this committee, that the case of the said Mr. Bradshaw be humbly offered to the parliament, to find out some way of satisfaction of the said sum of 2188 l. 11 s. 4 d. yet due and owing unto him, as aforesaid.

To the right honourable the council of state, by authority of parliament,

The humble petition of Richard Bradshaw esq; late resident at Hamburgh,

Humbly sheweth,

THAT your petitioner upon his humble address to your honours, and the perusal of Vol. lxvii. the accounts of your petitioner by the committee, to whom the same was referred p. 167. by your honours, obtained your order, that the case of your petitioner should be humbly reported to the parliament, to direct the payment of the sum of 2188 l. 11 s. 4 d. found by the said committee to be due and owing to your petitioner; which report, by reason of the want of time, and the many weighty affairs of state, could not be made before the parliament dissolved.

And forasmuch as your petitioner disbursed the said sum of 2188 l. 11 s. 4 d. at the request and by the special order of the then council of state, for the necessary services of the commonwealth, and to supply the navy in the Dutch war, with promise, that it should be duly repaid unto your petitioner; as also, that your petitioner suffered the loss of above 5000 l. in the late war in this nation, without any reparation for the same, and hath for above seventeen years freely exposed his life at home and abroad in the service of the state :

May it therefore please your honours, in consideration of your petitioner's singular condition, to order the payment of the said sum of 2188 l. 11 s. 4 d. to your petitioner, who otherwise must suffer greatly, if such a sum, and so disbursed out of his affection to his country, whilst he resided a public minister in foreign parts, be now at his return rent from his small estate, it being more than he hath got in the service of the commonwealth.

And your petitioner shall pray.

RIC. BRADSHAW,

Mr. Downing to the president of the council of state.

MY LORD,

Hague, $\frac{9}{19}$. March, 1660.

MONDAY last the French ambassador had audience againe in the assembly of the Vol. lxvii. states generall, and I have herein inclosed a copy of his proposition, relating principally to two things, viz. the present war between Sweden and Denmark, and the solicitation, which this state makes in England, and to les villes Hanseatiques, against the late imposition in France upon foreign vessells, at which they are heere not a little alarmed, that the king of France doth thus peremptorily and positively declare himself. But yet this people doe not use much to change their counsell for words, unless they see something else like to touch them. In the meane time an answer is preparing thereunto, the which, so far as I can yet perceive, is like but to be in generall; That they are on their part with all heartinesse endeavouring a peace betweene Sweden and Denmark, with reflexion to the accords, which have bin made about that matter; and that as to the new impost, that it cannot seeme strange, if this state, who subsist mostly by traffique, be sensible of a matter of that nature. And being in discourse this weeke with Mr. Boreel, he told me, that there is a clause in an ancient treaty between France and the United Provinces, whereby the king of France obliged himself and his heires, not to burthen the subjects of this state above his owne; and that that treaty is still in force. Wednesday Monf. Cojet was to have had audience in the states of Holland; but there being some difference about matter of ceremonie, he refused to take his audience, and sent by his secretary his proposition, which he intended to have made by word of mouth; a copy whereof I have herein inclosed,

A.D. 1659. inclosed, by which your lordship will perceive and understand particularly what it is Sweden would be at.

There are now letters come to every one, of the death of the king of Sweden, the which although it was generally beleived, before the French ambassador had his audience, and Monf. Cojet delivered in his proposition; yet in regard there were then no authentic letters of it, they did not think fitt upon the report thereof to delay the doeing of what they had in charge. And however people heere doe expresse a very wonderfull joy for the death of the king of Sweden, yet I doe not find, that the wiser of them do think, that the affaires of Sweden are like to be much changed thereby; and the king of France his declaring so high for Sweden, and the newes from their ministers at Copenhagen, that the ministers of England there do threaten to declare the king of Denmarke refusant; theis things do a little ballance their counsells. But truly, whatever France should say, were it not for fear of England, that in case they should quitt the conventions made at the Hague, they would assist Sweden; and that by the continuance of that warr the traffique of the Baltique sea would by little and little fall into the hands of the English; this state would certainly comply with the Imperialists, Poles, and Brandenburg, in declaring themselves for a general peace, of which if the Poles could in time have any assurance, they would certainly make no peace with Sweden. And indeed the not doing thereof hath very much alienated the minds of the Poles from the state, so as that I am confident, if this opportunity be not lost, very good conditions in point of trade may be had for the English in Prusse and Poland, the which this countrey hath many years together enjoyed entirely to itself, to their wonderful profit. And the Pole being at this time displeased with this state, and knowing how necessary it is for him, in regard of his posts upon the Baltick sea, to have the friendship of some state, which is powerfull in shipping, would, I am confident, very heartily embrace any overture, which should be made him from England. And for Sweden, it is known, that they rather desire peace with Poland than with Denmark, and could not but be well pleased therewith, as they are with France their intermeddling in the affaire between them and Poland, as well as between them and Denmark.

I have herein inclosed a copy of a memoriall, which I presented this day to the states general. The truth is, the lord Nieupoort continually plies you with complaints of ships of this country brought into the harbours of England by Swedish commissions; and hath had restitution forthwith by immediate order of the councell, without a referring them to the ordinary course of the admiralty; and would have your lordship to beleieve, that this state hath bin much more carefull in righting the subjects of England in this nature, then the government of England to the people of this country; whereas the truth is, it hath been quite otherwise. And as to the present stop, whereby the ships of England are hindered from pursuing their voyages to the Sound, (of which I also make complaint in my said memoriall) the matter of fact lyes thus: That this state, in regard of the present troubles in the Baltique sea, about a fortnight agoe gave order, that no ship of this country should go to those ports till the 20th of April, that so a good and sufficient convoy might be provided for them. And seeing that in the meane time a greate number of English ships were hired, and ladeing in the ports of this countrey with such commodities, as this countrey hath to goe to those parts, and would in a great measure have supplied the markett before the coming of the ships of this countrey, they have also hindered the going out of the English ships untill that time, to the very great detriment of the proprietors of them; and divers merchants and masters of ships, in the name of themselves and the rest, making a heavy complaint to me of this great injury, I thought it my duty to lay it before the state, and shall humbly expect your orders, how I shall carry myself therein.

The estates of Holland are now fully assembled, and the instructions are making ready for him, who is to be sent ambassador extraordinary into France; and it's probable, that they will next week nominate the person, whome they would have to be sent thither; for that the king of France his so peremptorily declaring himself in relation to the business between Sweeden and Denmarke, and that of the new impost, do very much touch them; and they hope by this ambassay to be able to work something, as also in relation to the principality of Orange, or at least to be able to keep matters in suspense, which is all that this state needs or desired, as their affairs now stand; for that they having a force in the Sound, if nothing of a counter-balance be opposed, they will be able to bring Sweden to what terms they please; and England shall not at all be considered neither by Dane nor Swede. And if this country shall bring that affair to their mind, and have the force at liberty, which they are forced at this time to imploy in those parts, I need not say what will be the consequences thereof.

The states of Holland are also now in deliberation about lending a some of money to the king of Denmark upon security, as I have given notice in some of my former, and shall wait your lordship's orders about it. They are also now in deliberation about the hastening hastening of the equipping of forty-eight men of warr, over and above those which they A.D. 1659 have already in the Sound, and which are fitting for convoys. I have this day an account from Rotterdam, that a Yarmouth ship of about 140 tons, and a ship belonging to Burlington, (as I take it) of about 300 ton, were this last weeke taken and carryed to Ostend; and the English merchants in this countrey do earnestly desire, that they might have a convoy from hence for the Sound; the which if they had, I know would be the occasion of imploying of a very great number of English shiping; but without a convoy they say plainly, that they dare not stir, in regard of the danger of the seas.

I have herewith inclosed a packet from Copenhagen, and am,

MY LORD,

Your lordship's most obedient humble servant,

G. DOWNING.

I AGAIN pressed a new conference with the commissioners of state. I was told, that Vol. lxvii. Sir John Holland and the other commissioners for foreign affairs had order to confer p. 174. with me; and that Mr. Thurloe should search the records, to be better informed; but afterwards Mr. Thurloe sent me word, that the letters newly received from the Sound were to be read and examined in the council; so that the commissioners could not come to the conference. Since which I understood, that the officers of the army were assembled, and that there had been a conference between the said officers and some members of parliament before general Monck. The said officers, fearing, that the parliament had a design to re-establish the king, assembled at St. James's, and resolved to present a declaration to the parliament: but this morning I hear they have been pacified by the promise, that the parliament would pass such acts before their separation, that they should be therewith satisfied. This morning there have been again great debates touching the writs; and by reason of the difference of opinions, the parliament assembled in the afternoon a great committee. And because this debate is of great importance, the most of the council of state came thither. To-morrow I shall press again to have a conference with the commissioners of the council, and render an account thereof to your H. M.

An intercepted letter.

SIR,

Bruxells, saturday, $\frac{10}{20}$. March, 1660.

YOURS of the $\frac{1}{11}$. instant came well to me, and was the more wellcome for bringing Vol. lxvii. the good news of your health; but that you sent to Mr. Betts by the way of Paris, Ip. 182. have not received.

Yours to Mr. Bissiter are received by him. I wish my nephew much prosperity in his traffique, which he is gone. Your friends here are much comforted with the good news of a hopefull happy settlement of the government, that trade may be more secure then formerly. As concerning 344's intentions, I doubt our friends there may, as you say, be too confident of his good meaning to the king, considering his unstable resolutions: but certainly, if he duly consider his countrie's or his own interest, he cannot do any thing, that will be of more advantage to both, then heartily to endeavour his majestie's establishment; and my hope in God is, that if he shall decline that course, that the nations and countries, when the militia shall be put into the hands of good and sober men, will compell to it, or do it without him: for if our intelligence here be true, the whole kingdom in generall is well disposed to establish the king, without which it is evident the nation can never be safe or happy. I do not imagin what the phanatique sectaries can do to hinder his majestie's restoration; and surely they, that look to settle a commonwealth, will in time find it so much against the genius of the nation, as they will discern it to be an extreme difficulty, if not impossible work, to be accomplished. I wish you should be well advised, and see the affairs and government in England in better hands, before you begin any sut for recovery of your estate. For though you were never in

A.D. 1659. armes against the parliament, yet having been so for the king, I doubt till better times you will find little favour or justice; for very many of the most powerfull partie-men of the counsell of state are yet violent against the king, if I am rightly informed. But when this parliament shall be dissolved, and a new and free parliament shall sit, I am persuaded they will soon take such resolutions, as honest men may be the better for it; and possibly you may have better measures, whereby to make a judgment, what course will be better for you to take to recover your right. And I hope it will not now be many months, before we shall see a happy revolution and change in the affairs and government in England, which I wish you would attend. I am very glad, you have made acquaintance with Mr. 48. 274, who is an able and honest man, and who can best advise you. And if you think fit, you may let him know from me, that the king takes particular notice of his good affections to his majestie's and his country's good interest. If 244 continues to be ruled by 199, and they of his gang, I shall despair of much good from him; for he that is so censorious, as that he cannot forgive himself, will not believe, that the king will forgive him; though all men will find, that his majesty is far more gracious and redy to pardon any, that shall manifest his penitence by his endeavouring to restore his majestie, then they can possibly imagine; for his majestie is far from a vindictive nature. If your friend 785 728 . . . a Wiltshire gentleman. I am glad, he gives good hopes, that you shall find store of friends there, to assist you. If this letter come safe, I shall write to you more frequently; and I pray favour me with your occurrences as oft as you have opportunity. I am glad to hear, that 198 and 495 is well inclined to the king's interest, which is indeed the true interest of the nation. All my family are very much your servants, as I am constantly,

Vol. lxvii.
p. 177.

I HAVE received your H. and M. lordships letter of the 15th, and precisely observed all your commands mentioned therein, and have done therein more nor less than other foreign ministers, that reside here. About the publishing of the peace no extraordinary solemnities have been used here, only the discharging of some great guns, founding of trumpets, beating of drums, and the like, but no men in arms.

Here is little or no news to advise your H. and M. lordships from hence at this time: only I find amongst the followers of his majesty of England, that they have great hopes of his majesty's restoration.

Vol. lxvii.
p. 202.

ALTHOUGH I have not written to you since that of mine, which you say was without a date; yet I have desired a friend of mine to impart to you, what I thought might concern you to know from hence, and particularly the going of the Eastern merchants with their books and accounts, without so much as opening of them here; nor do I know, what their cargafoon amounted unto. You may perhaps have the sum from your son; for there it is they intend to expose the sale of their commodities. Nor can I in truth tell you,

Jermyn and Montagu,

cardinal Mazarin

what price that merchandize bears here. I think the prime dealer in these parts is unwilling to meddle, unless he may have a very profitable and secure bargain. When I do know and can say more, that is any thing to purpose, you shall be sure to have it in wider lines.

I know not what public news to send you from hence. The success of the duke of Brandenburg's, and states of Holland, their mediation concerning Orange, is yet doubtful. The marriage holds in design for the twentieth of April, and the court is expected here towards the latter end of May; and I hope (if better occasion hinder not) you will be there to see the triumphs, and to see the stately structures at both ends of the Louvre. Thus (by different fates) some kings are busy about ornaments, whilst other sovereigns are troubled to recover their lost kingdoms.

This Lewis's grandfather was fain to fight for foundations.

The

The council to the English commissioners in the Sound.

GENTLEMEN,

BY yours of the 25. Feb. received by your secretary Mr. Henry Sterry, wee under-stand how farre the negotiation for reconcilinge the two Northern kings is brought; and findinge thereby the difficulty of the peace to lye on the Danes side, wee thought it necessary to conferr with the ambassador of the United Provinces resideinge here upon that subject; and further to inforce the same desire in effect, which you had made to the publique ministers of the same state now in Dennemarke, as you will see by the paper exhibited to the sayd ambassador, a copy whereof is herewith sent you. At the delivery of this paper, the ambassador did much presse, that consideration might be had of the damages susteyned by the Dane, since the refusal of the Suede to accept the conditions of the peace, conformable to what is insisted upon by the Danish minister here. But it beinge opened to hym, that this demand was not only contrary to the treaties of the Hague, but was of that nature, that if it were insisted upon, must necessarily render all endeavours for the peace ineffectuall, and keep those parts still imbroyled in warre, he at last summed up all in this, and much insisted thereupon, that the 400000 ryx-dollars be releas'd by the Suede to the Dane; which gave occasion to examine, how that stood upon the treatyes at the Hague, which beinge looked into, the state thereof appeared to be this: That by the third article of the treaty of the 1st. July, the seignory of Dronthain in Norway was to remayne to the Dane, contrary to the treaty of Roschild; but as to all other things, the treaty of Roschild was to be exactly observed, and nothings to be aded to it, or taken from it; yet soe as that by these conditions the liberty of treatinge with the kinge of Sueden, touching the remittinge to the Dane the 400000 ryx-dollars, be not taken away. Upon which it was urged, that the intention of these two states in penning this article in this manner, appears plainly enough to be, that this of 400000 ryx-dollars might be treated upon with the Suede for the remittinge thereof; but if the Swede should refuse to doe it, yet it was not to hinder the peace. Whereto the ambassador answered, that he acknowledged the words to carry that sense and meaning; but did asser't the article was so penned at the earnest desire of Mr. Downinge, who at the tyme of makinge this agreement at the Hague did undertake, that in case the states generall would sufferr it to passe in those termes, that instructions should notwithstandinge be given to the English plenipotentiarys in the Sound, to insist upon the releasinge of that money, as a necessary condition of the peace; as alsoe, that the commissioners, which were sent to the said ambassador by the then council of state, to conferre with hym upon these affaires, did assure him as much; and upon these assurances (he sayd) the states generall did depend, and thereupon were willing to agree to that article in this manner, which otherwise they had never done. He further alledged, that this agreement touching the 400000 ryx-dollars was noe part of the Roschild treaty, but was extorted from the king of Denmark long after that treaty concluded, by quarteringe the Swedish forces upon his dominions, which the Swede refused to remove, till the payment of this money was secured to him; addinge many other reasons in equity for remittinge of it, and concluded with this, that it was not possible for the king of Denmarke, his countrys beinge soe ruined and wasted as they are, ever to satisfy soe great a summe of money; and therefore noe peace could be made. If it were still insisted upon, or if the king of Denmark should be compelled by force to agree a peace upon that condition, this demand alone must necessarily prove the seed of a new warr. Our commissioners did then demand of him, whether, if the king of Sweden were induced to release this point of his money, there would remayne noe other difficulty on the Danes side; but that the peace would be made upon the conditions propounded. To which the ambassador answered, that he had no proper instructions therein; but did assure, that so farre as he knew the intentions of his superiors, (and believed he did fully know them in this particular) that if this might be graunted, neither damages nor ought else would be further insisted upon by the states general; but that they would doe all that lay in their power to compell the Dane to accept the conditions of the peace agreed upon by the former treatyes of the Hague.

Wee have alsoe by commissioners conferred with the French ambassador, upon his own desire, touching these affaires; who in the French king's name expressed a great desire to have this peace concluded upon the terms agreed upon at the Hague, offering with much warmth to joine with England in givinge a reall and effectuall assistance to the crowne of Sweden, in case the peace can't be made, and to manadge all things by joynt counsell, haveinge powers and authoritys to send the same instructions both to the French ambassador in Denmarke, and to Mr. de Thou at the Hague; which wee shall send to you and the English envoye in Holland.

Upon consideration therefore of this whole case, all the directions, which will be needfull for us to give you, will be, that you pursue your former instructions, and endeavour to make the peace between the two Northerne kings on the same grounds, which you have hitherto proceeded upon; as the likeliest meanes (as things now stand) to compose the troubles

A.D. 1659. troubles in those parts. And as to what is insisted upon touching the 400000 ryx-dollars, it being urged as a thing already agreed between these two states; and being informed by one of our own number, that the former counsell of state did order their commissioners to declare to the Dutch ambassador, they would give instructions to their plenipotentiaries in the Sound to insist upon the remitting of it, as a necessary condition of the peace; and we judging it of no such consequence to the Swede, as that a warre of soe much danger to all Europe should be continued upon that ground; in case you can agree all other things between them, and that the Dane upon remitting of his money to him will lay aside his pretences of damages, (the consideration whereof is in noe sort to be admitted, no more than is the generall treaty, which the Dane mentions) and quitt the other pretences he makes inconsistent with the said treatyes, soe that the peace will ensue thereupon; you shall then both by yourselves, as also in conjunction with the publique ministers of the other mediating states, as you shall find it necessary, insist upon the releasing of the said 400000 ryx-dollars by Sweden to Denmark; and so to accommodate that business with them, that the peace may not be hindered or retarded thereby. And this, upon the reasons aforesaid, we doe not think to be any change of the conditions already agreed upon.

That, which you write touching the demand of the states generall of security to be given them by the Dane for all charges, which they have been at, as well for their fleets as the 6000 foot, is very considerable; and we have had notice from the Hague, that there is a treaty between them and the Danes for the seigneurie of Drontheim; upon which the Dutch ambassador here hath been spoke with, who denies to have any knowledge thereof.

But wee looke upon any negotiations of this kind to be of soe great consequence to England, that all meanes should be used to prevent the effecting of any thing therein. And therefore you are to use your utmost diligence to inform yourselves of what counsells or treatyes may be on foot in reference thereto; and, as you finde it necessary, to represent both to the king of Denmark and to the publique ministers of the states generall in very serious terms, that the putting of any parte of the king of Denmarke's dominions into the hands or power of the states generall for satisfaction of charges, or upon any other pretences, must needs administer great grounds of jealousy to England, and is that, which this state can by noe means sufferr; and therefore to desire, that nothing of this kind may be done, nor that point of charges treated of, but in the same manner, in which this whole business hath been hitherto managed, that is, by joynt counsells, England havinge alsoe an equall interest in that, as in any parts of the peace. And wee desire you will carefully from time to time communicate to us, what you shall be informed of upon this subject, to the end wee may alsoe give all necessary direction in it to Mr. Downinge at the Hague.

Wee have read the copy of that authority, which the states generall have sent to their commissioners in Denmark for the warranting of this peace, in case it shall be made; and according to your desire, have sent you an authority for the same purpose in the same forme, as also another in reference to the peace between Sweden and Poland. And as to what you write touching that peace, wee understand by letters from those parts and from the Hague, that the treatye between those two crownes is soe farre advanced, that the peace is as good as made, altho' the same is very much opposed by the emperor and some other states, who endeavour to breake the treatyes at Denmark and Dantzick, and instead of these to set on foot a treaty for a generall peace, thinkinge that to be the best meanes to continue the warre, wherein they tooke their advantage to lye. But you will be able, where you are, to knowe the true state of those affaires; and therefore as to your goinge to Dantzick to prosecute that peace, wherein you have already offered the mediation of this state, wee leave it wholly to yourselves to doe therein, as you shall find the reason of affaires to require, soe as neither the peace between Sweden and Denmark, nor the ratification thereof, be deferred thereby, or made to depend thereupon, which we do not think advisa- ble at this time to be done; it beinge certain, that the peace in Poland will follow this in Denmark; but whether it be true e contra, that we much doubt.

You will also receive herewith new powers and letters credentialls to the king of Sweden, as alsoe to the kings of Sweden and Denmark joyntly. Your other authorities to Denmark and Poland are still in force, and will not be necessary to be renewed.

Vol. lxvii.
P. 169.

IT being reported to the council this day by a committee, to whom the same was referred, that upon perusal of the accounts of Richard Bradshaw esquire, late resident of this com- monwealth at Hamburgh, as also of a copy of a privy-seal granted by the late protector, dated dated the thirty-first of January, 1658, there appears due to him the said Mr. Bradshaw, A.D. 1659. upon the said account, the sum of 2188 l. 11 s. 4 d. in which accounts are comprehended the charges of his negotiation to Denmark, disbursements to Mr. Rolt in his negotiation to Sweden, the charges of his negotiation to Muscovy, his own salary as resident at Ham-burgh, and the provision of powder and masts there for the parliament's service, during the late Dutch war, and other services of intelligence, &c.

Ordered,

That the case of the said Mr. Bradshaw be humbly reported to the parliament for their directing such ways, as they shall think fit, for the satisfying of the said sum due and owing to him as afore said.

JOHN RUSHWORTH, cl^r of the council.

Memorial of Mr. Downing, the English envoy in Holland, to the states general.

THE underwritten extraordinary envoy of England being informed, that a certain ship of Newcastle, called the William and Thomas, was in the month of July, 1657, taken near the same place by one captain Peter de Ruyter of Dunkirk; and that Edward Boulmer, master of her, being taken out of her and carried to Ostend, knew not what was become of her; but coming this winter to Amsterdam, about other occasions, found there his said ship; and that after her being taken, she was brought directly thither, and there unladen, and both ship and goods sold; and that the said ship from that time to this hath never been from Amsterdam; and that thereupon he laid an arrest upon the said ship, no ways, doubting according to justice and the law of nations, to have had her forthwith restored to him; but on the contrary, the ordinary judge of that town hath taken off the said arrest, under pretence of a certain sentence given against the said ship and goods at Dunkirk, although the said ship was never carried thither, or to any port of the dominions of the king of Spain: Vol. lxvii. p. 200.

The said extraordinary envoy desires, that it would please their lordships the states general of the United Provinces seriously to reflect of the premises, and what will be the consequence in relation to their own subjects, if private men of war may bring in their prizes into a harbour of a state, that is neuter, and there unlade, sell, and dispose of them; and that a sentence given in any part of the dominions of that prince, from whom they have their commissions, without bringing their prizes thither, be admitted for good and valid; and doth demand, that the said ship, as also its lading, (in case the persons, that bought it, can be found) may be forthwith restored to the said master for the use of the proprietors.

And the said extraordinary envoy represents further to their lordships, that having by his memorial of the thirty-first of October last, at the instances of the plenipotentiaries of England in the Sound, made known to their lordships, that a certain ship of Lubeck, called the Sun, laden with rye, by Thomas Bawtry merchant of London, upon his own proper and sole account, and bound for Newcastle, was the eighth of July last, about the island of Bornholme, seized by a Danish man of war, who alleging, that his master had great necessity of corn, said, that he must carry her to Copenhagen, where the said corn should be forthwith paid for; but in the way, being met by a Swedish man of war, the said ship was taken from the Dane; and he, alleging, that his master had great necessity for corn for his garisons in Pomerland, said he must carry her thither, where also the said corn should be paid for; but before she arrived there, she was met with by some men of war of this place, under the command of the lord admiral Opdam, who took both her and the said Swede, and sent her to Amsterdam, where she now is. That yet to this day no answer hath been vouchsafed to be given thereunto; and instead of reparation of the damages suffered by the proprietors by the long detention of his corn, the admiralty of Amsterdam (after above 2000 guilders in pursuit of the business) have confiscated.

And seeing the said corn was never out of the possession of the proprietor, neither as being in the hands of the Dane, neither as being in the hands of the Swede; and moreover, that no war being declared against Sweden, although the proprietor of the said corn had of his own accord sent it to any part of Sweden; yet that it was not confiscable by this state, it being lawful for the people of England to carry any sort of commodities to any haven belonging to any friend of England, against which it was not declared by this state.

The said extraordinary envoy doth therefore again demand, that the said corn may be forthwith returned; that otherwise their lordships will have no reason to think it strange, if in case of so great and notorious injustice, recourse may be had to such means as may be sufficient, and which are warrantable for the obtaining of right for the people of England, where it shall have been so notoriously denied in the ordinary way of justice.

MY obligation increaseth for your undeserved civilities. I wish matters were more clear there, that our resolutions might be sooner determined. Without doubt, in judgment and reason all things tend to a noble end: yet the enigmatical general doth render some doubts among us. Sir, be pleased to continue your constant correspondence: your account hitherto hath been very ingenious and perfect, and the best approved of by persons of a higher sphere than any other. It hath appeared still the most exact, and you have thereby gained much reputation.

As to his master's being confined, or making an escape from Brussels, there is no such matter, as I have formerly hinted. He is most highly cared for there by all princes and states.

Extract of the resolutions of the states general.

Veneris, 26. of March, 1660. [N. S.]

Vol. lxvii.
p. 210.

WAS once more produced in the assembly the letter of the lords commissioners extraordinary of this state with the kings of Sweden and Denmark, writ at Copenhagen the thirteenth of December last, with the inclosed papers, containing the desired elucidations about the treaty of Elbing, with a certain act of redintegration of amity; and also a third act, containing the time and the conditions, when and upon which the said act shall be obligatory; all concluded and signed between commissioners of the king of Sweden on the one side, and the lords commissioners extraordinary of this state on the other side, upon the 29. Nov. 1659. Decem.

Whereupon debate being had, their high and mighty lordships have approved of and ratified all the said acts in omnibus & per omnia, so and in such manner, as they are expressed, as they do approve and ratify the same by these presents. Wherefore a due act of ratification in the usual form shall be dispatched according.

Hague, 26. March, 1660. [N. S.]

MY LORD,

Vol. lxvii.
p. 211.

YESTERDAY the lords states of Holland adjourned till the thirteenth of April. Their H. and M. L. have agreed to the two hundredth penny for the service of the extraordinary equipage of forty-eight ships of war, which are making ready by the admiralty. And concerning the peace in the North, it is resolved to stick to the conventions made at the Hague between the three states; and thereupon to further the peace between Denmark and Sweden, as also that in Poland. Furthermore, that 60000 rix-dollars shall be paid to the lords ambassadors extraordinary of Denmark for the paying of the garison of Copenhagen, provided they give security to repay it. Also they have consented to accommodate the city of Munster with 100000 rix-dollars, by way of loan, provided they make no accommodation or treaty with any other kingdom or state: and likewise, that the ambassador of Portugal shall be desired to restore Brazil; and if he refuse to grant it, then to have no further treaty with him. The lord Beuningen is appointed to go ambassador for France; and the lord of Merode to Spain. The embassy is to begin in the month of May.

Monf. de Thou hath not yet received any answer to his proposition made upon the twenty-third of February, and the sixteenth instant, to their H. and M. L. about the peace in the North. The states have debated about it all this week, and an answer is drawn up, but not yet sent to him. The states remonstrate in the said answer, that they have from time to time used their utmost endeavours for the making of peace between Denmark and Sweden; but the like endeavours had not been used by France, otherwise the peace had long since been concluded. And concerning the new imposts upon the ships, that the same was contrary to the alliance made between France and this state. And this was writ in answer to the king's letter of the fourth of the last month. The lord ambassador Boreel goeth before to acquaint this court with the intention of this state sending the extraordinary embassy to renew the old alliance.

De Thou, the French ambassador in Holland, to Bordeaux, the French ambassador in England.

MY LORD,

Hague, 26. March. [N. S.] 1660.

I HAVE read yours of the nineteenth, wherein you continue to inform me very particularly of the affairs of England, for which I am obliged to you, and beg your continuance; for the news from others I do very much suspect. Undoubtedly affairs there are in an uncertain condition: what the issue thereof will be, a little time will make manifest. The royal party here is very confident of their business. In my last I sent you my proposition to the lords states, upon which they have made several deliberations; and I hear they have at last resolved upon an answer to be given to his majesty, as also one to myself; but what it is, yet I know not; for it hath not been yet communicated to me. In the mean time the states of Holland are separated, having first named, on the behalf of their province, the ambassadors to be sent to the two crowns, namely, Monsr. van Beuningen for France, and the baron of Merode for Spain; unto which are to be added two more from the other provinces.

A.D. 1659.
Vol. lxvii.
p. 212.

I send you here inclosed a letter from Monsr. de Lombres. Without doubt you will see in this letter the declaration of the young king, who puts the business of the peace in a fair way; and when the states of Holland meet again, which will be the eighth of the next month, they will come to some resolution about the affairs of the North.

A letter of Mr. Downing to the president of the council.

MY LORD,

Hague, $\frac{16}{26}$. March, 1660.

THIS day an answer is given to the French ambassador, both to the proposition, which he made by mouth, and to the letter of his king, a copy whereof I have heere inclosed to your lordship, and therefore shall not neede to comment thereupon: and conforme thereunto, there is a resolution taken in the states of Holland, which is to be carryed to the states general, for giving an answer of the like nature to me concerning the affairs of the North, that this state is resolved to adhere still to the conventions, which were made here; but yet insisting, that the king of Denmark may have satisfaction for the damages, which he hath suffered this winter by the delay of the peace. And concerning that particular, the principals of the states have exceedingly pressed me in private conferences; but however I can assure you, that they will be glad of a peace in those parts: for that that warre costs them deare, and is like to cost them dearer, if the Poles make their peace with the Swedes (as they are upon the point of doing, as you will perceive by one of the inclosed); and in regard they see plainly, that if this warr continue, the traffique of all the Sound would in a little time fall principally into the hands of the English, as indeed I am sure it would, if your lordship would please to take course, that the English may have a constant sure convoy thither, as the Dutch have. And the reason why I do so often make mention of this particular, 'tis because I think there is not any one thing would so much contribute to the encouragement of shipping and mariners in England.

The last letters from the deputies of this state at Copenhagen give this state very great hopes of a suddain conclusion of the peace there; and that to the entire content of this state; yea that they have hopes of obteyning Bornholme or something els for the king of Denmark for his dedamagement, for what he hath suffered this winter. Yet they are not a little alarmed at what they have privately received this post from London, that the ministers of Sweden there had so suddainly received new letters of credence, and demanded audience; and that in that audience they intend to speak to the disadvantage of this state, and to insist, that the king of Sweden might have something for a compensation for what he quits, over and above the treaty of Roscheild; whereas this state would not only have him quitt Drontheim, but give something further to the Dane, as is above-said. And the lord Nieupoort hath this post very pressing orders sent him, to be very vigilant and carefull in this matter, the which, the truth is, doth very highly import this state; and when they shall have settled that affair to their minds, they will be very powerfull: the very hopes whereof hath already made a very great change in the prises of things, and given such credit to the cantores of this state, as that the valew of money upon them is within this month risen above one per cent.

The states of Holland have this weeke nominated van Buningen, late ambassador from this state at Copenhagen, to be one of the ambassadors extraordinary to the king of France, and Mynheere Merode to be one of the extraordinary ambassadors for Spayne; and it is reported, that the heeres van Ghent of Gelderland, and Aloa of Frize, will be added, on the behalf of the other provinces, to go to France: and the heere van Amron of Utrecht for Spayne; and the ambassy for Spayne is besides matter of compliment, principally upon matters of traffique, hoping to gain something of priviledge to this state, with relation

A.D. 1659. relation to the Spanish wools, and the salt of a certain island belonging to the Spaniard, which this countrey hath for many years exceedingly desired, that so they might be assured of salt for their fisherys, altho' they should have a warr both with Portugal and France. And for the instructions for the ambassay for France, I have in one of the inclosed sent you the principal points thereof; and seeing there is intended to push on a new allyance with France; I doubt not, but that your lordship will seriously reflect thereupon, and how much they may concern England. And as to the late imposition upon foreign ships in France, the instructions are very precise, that they use all their possible endeavours for their takeing off thereof; and for that they pretend some clauses in an ancient allyance between France and this state, now in force, the truth whereof being a little desirous particularly to know, I made search after, and have herein inclosed a copy of what I find concerning that matter. Whether England hath so much to say, I know not: and however this state did speak much of defending of the bringing of any French commoditys into this country, untill it should be taken off; yet there is nothing done therein: and notwithstanding the placart forbidding the subjects of this countrey to pay upon great paines, yet I find that great fleets are come home from France, who have paid it, and nothing done to any of them; the which I thought it my duty to let your lordship know as matter of fact, in regard of the continued instance of Monsieur Nieupoort at London about this matter.

As for the business of Portugal, I have herein inclosed a copy of proposition given in this weeke to the states generall by the ambassador of Portugall heere, in answer to a paper of the states generall, which I lately sent you; but the states of Holland, in regard of the feasts approaching, are this last night seperated; and nothing will be done, untill they first declare themselves: and not onely the West-Indy company do vehemently oppose the making of any agreement, without the restitution of the lands of Brafeil, which were taken from them; but the East-India company are underhand very willing, that warr should continue, for that they have greatly profitted thereby, having during this warr taken many considerable places from the Portugal, made themselves sole masters of those places, which afforded the cinnamon, and some other spices; whereby they have that trade wholly in their own hands, and can set the price as they please: and I am informed, that they are at this time sending a considerable force of souldiers from hence to the East-Indys; and they doe hope, before the making of that peace, to beat the Portugal out of those parts; and truly they are very likely to do it; and then (whereas the English and Portugal together are able in some measure to ballance the Dutch in those parts) the English will be left alone, and be so inconsiderable, in comparison of them, as I doubt they will be forced to give over that trade; the which I could very particularly make appear, but that it is too large for a letter.

Upon examination I do find, that there are dayly great quantitys of English wool brought from England to this countrey; and being particularly informed, that one John Signey or Signam, master of a vessel called the Elizabeth, of Lyn, had lately brought over from thence a parcell of wool to Dort, I desired the deputy-governor of the merchant-adventurers of England to examine the business; but yet so, as that the said Signey might not be at all alarmed, or have any notice thereof: and I have here inclosed to your lordship a copy of the examination taken upon oath, and humbly submit it to you. And truly unless something be by parliament very speedily done, in relation to the woollen manufacture of England, as this country hath already in a manner wholly gotten the manufacturing of fine cloth, so this country and Silesia will between them divide also the manufacturing of course cloth, and England have nothing left but the groath of its wool, as formerly it had, being constreyned to send it abroad to be manufactured.

I have herein inclosed a copy of a memorial, which I this weeke presented to the states generall, concerning a ship brought by a Flanders man of warr into this country; and concerning a ship lading of corn, belonging to a merchant of London taken by some men of warr of this state, and brought to Amsterdam, and there confiscated by the admiralty. Some of the admiralty themselves were so ashamed of the sentence, as that they protested against it; and the merchant himself going to some of the rest of them, and asking of them why and upon what ground they could give such a sentence against him; and that he had clearly proved, that the corn in it was his, and it was bound for England; they replied, that all that was true, but that they must do what they had done for the good of their country. It is my duty humbly to lay theis things before you, humbly expecting your orders thereupon. And I have learnt by the experience, that I have had in this countrey, that when they are put to it, they will do the people of England right, but not one jot farther; the which I am sorry to have occasion to say, but yet it is no more than the truth; and therefore I should be unsaythfull to my countrey, if I did not say it; and it is no more then I have many a time been forced to say in publique to the state itself. But the truth is, they thinke, that at this time you have so much to do at home, as that you will not much minde the sufferings of the subjects of England abroad. Besides, they hope by their ways to enforce you to pass the placart, entitled a placart for prevention of A.D. 1659.

 pyracies, the which the lord Nieupoort presseth you about; concerning which I have about 3 weekes or a month ago offered my poore thoughts: but whether those letters came to your hands, I know not; and in the mean time whether the lord Nieupoort make any complaints, concerning matters of this nature, to the councill: to which, concerning any ship of this countrey, brought into any haven of England by any private man of war with a Swedish or Portugais comission, the councill hath still, by order of state, (without referring the matter to the court of admiralty of England) seized and restored the said ships; and so, not finding themselves agrieved, they are the more negligent. Whereas, if you please, when any future complaints shall be made of that nature, not to seize or restore the said ships by order of state, but to refer the said matters to the court of admiralty and the course of law, I dare undertake, that the people of England shall for the future have very good justice heere, and my selfe rid of a great deal of trouble, which I have upon all such occasions; for that, when they shall find, how their people will be vexed by the delays and charges of the law, they will be first, who will make restitution by order of state into a summary way, that so their people may again be treated in those cases, as of late they have bin.

Finding that the Danes doe still insist to have some moneys sent them by this state, and that there is heere still a great inclination to get, if not some place of the Danes into their hands, yet at least the tolls of Dronthem, and if possible of the Sound also; although, having no orders from you, I have not given any hint to the state about it, yet in private discourses with those who have the principal direction, I do dayly remonstrate, that England cannot sufferr, that this countrey should have any such place delivered to them, nor yet that they should have the gathering of any of their tolls; for that it would be very destructive to the merchants and trade of England. Such is the constitution of this government, as that things may with care be prevented, but very hardly retrieved, when once passed.

Some letters say, that Wrangle is dead. The assembly of the state of Holland will be heere again about 3 weekes hence, when matters of importance will be again in debate; and I desire, that I may against that time have your full instructions, how to comport myself in relation to your affaires; and am,

My LORD,

Your lordship's most obedient humble servant,

G. DOWNING.

One thing I must put you in mind, that in the treaty of Elbing there are theis words, Imo ad scopi ipsius, qui articulo primo prædicti fæderis indigitatum clariorem intellectum declaramus, eundem directum esse et in posterum fore contra turbatores omnes et quoscunque, qui adversus perspicuum ipsius fæderis sensum quicquid agere susceperint. And speaking with Mr. Coyet here about them, he told me, that those words were put in at the instance of the ministers of this state, particularly with regard to England; for that the Swedes, during the war between England and this country, being pressed to do something against England, did excuse themselves upon something of the meaning of the words of the former treaty with this state. And therefore they would have the words added into the treaty of Elbing, by which that treaty is confirmed contra quoscunque, &c. and I doubt not, but you will have a care, that matters be so carryed, and such an elucidation made in relation thereunto, as that England, in being a means to procure to this countrey the treaty of Elbing, may not thereby lay a foundation of drawing the Swedes from them, in case they should hereafter have any trouble with this country; and also that at the same time an act may pass for England having equal benefit with this state in point of traffique, in relation to what they are to have by the treaty of Elbing and its elucidations, and in relation to all the treatys, which this state hath with Denmarke; for I doubt, whether this will be so easily obtained afterwards, as at the making of the peace, at which time it cannot be denied you.

This week the secretary of the Spanish ambassade gave the French ambassador here a visit with a great deal of compliment and carefs; and the Spanish ambassador intends to be here this next week or the week after; namely, to endeavour to hinder this state's coming to any agreement with Portugal. I have not had any letter from the councill of state since their choyce; the which I little wonder at. If they do not like my being here, truly I am very willing to return home, this employment having been to me troublesome and chargeable enough. I pray that I may have a word from you about it; and how matters are like to be steered, in relation to settlement at home, of which there is here so much and so differing discourse. I pray God guide your counsels, and that England may not be alwayes in these uncertaintyes, by which it greatly suffers. I am,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Your most faithfull humble servant,

G. DOWNING.

That the king having given them notice of the peace made between the two crowns, A.D. 1659. the ambassadors shall congratulate with his majesty, and protesting the good they hope thence for all Christendom.

Also to congratulate about the marriage of the king.

After these alliances with the king and queen, they shall address themselves to the cardinal Mazarin, professing the great esteem, that their H. M. have of his person, praying him to continue in his good affection toward them, and to augment the mutual good correspondence.

Afterwards they shall speak to him of the renewing of the league, and also to the commissioners of his majesty, extending the said league to all the places of France and of the two countries, but without further engagement, than the sending of assistance after the one or the other shall be attacked; and after they shall have laboured in vain for a peace, remembering that it is the aim of the league, and that they shall make a draught of the treaty of 1596, and articles for concluding the said league, according to the clause in the agreement of 1657.

Moreover they shall conclude the treaty marine, according to what was agreed 1657; and as his majesty hath granted to other nations; and complain of the in-execution of orders and placarts published against pirates; also of the in-observance of the agreement of 1657, in relation to the restoring of prizes, and of the erecting the company or monopoly of whale-oil, and of the new impost upon foreigners ships, and other things, that shall be from time to time enjoined them.

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Samedy, le 20^{me} Mars, 1660.

IL y a eu un memoire des ambassadeurs de Dennemarc, requerant quelques 5 fleuytes, Vol. lxvii. pour s'en servir aux environs des isles, & pour transporter du monde. Ce qui est mis es p. 180. mains des commissaires, & par la Hollande overgenoomen.

Il y a eue proposition pour ce qu'on appelle syuvering van binnelantsche passporten; item, le verboodemen de marchandises au Zas: cela est overgenoomen.

La Hollande estoit prest avec leur advis pour la responce à faire sur la proposition de l'ambassadeur de France; mais le president estoit desja fort, & s'excusoit de revenir. Je ne sçay, si on voudra relever cela si haut, comme le roy de France fit la proposition du sieur Boreel autrefois.

Le 22^{me} dito.

La ville d'Amsterdam recommande fort tel Schuyt pour le consulat à Smirne; le Nort-Hollande tel Smits.

L'on a intention d'envoyer l'ambassade vers Espagne par mer, & ce ne sera qu'un compliment; mais celle de vers la France est de plus grande consequence; & la lastgelt est une grande partie de l'ambassade: & on n'est pas bien satisfait des villes Hanseatiques, qu'elle ne se joignent pas avec cest estat en cela; ou ne se declarent pas rondement.

Au lieu de respondre icy à l'ambassadeur de France, on veut respondre par une lettre à son roy; en quoy sera dit entre autres, qu'on a proprement appaisé la guerre du Nort, & qu'on persiste en cela; & consequemment que l'ambassadeur taxe sans raison cest estat, comme formentant la guerre; mais cette lettre n'est pas encore arrestée; ains sera examinée.

Il y a un concept du conseil d'estat, pour faire ou avoir tousjours un corps de fix mille matelots; sur quoy on escoutra les admirautés.

Les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc urgent les resolutions & declarations favorables sur leur memoire.

Le 23^{me} dito.

L'on n'est pas bien satisfait de la declaration du roy de Pologne, donnée au sieur van Honard; & je crains, qu'enfin le Dennemarc de même aura du contentement fort mediocre, parcequ'icy on resould si lentement, & qu'on differe ce subside pour le garnison de Copenhagen. L'equipage neantmoins enfin sera arresté et resolu, quoyque la Zelande persiste. Item, la responce au roy de France sans encore avoir celle de pour l'ambassadeur.

Le 24^{me} dito.

De l'ambassadeur de Portugal est venue une responce, qui n'est pas leüe; ains mis es mains des commissaires. Il y a eü grand debat sur les responses à faire à la lettre du roy de France: maintenant aussy l'on incline de donner une responce à l'ambassadeur de Thou, mais rien encore n'est arrestée.

Il y a grande brigue touchant les ambassades vers la France & l'Espagne.

La

A.D. 1659. La Hollande a nommé le sieur de Merode vers Espagne, le sieur de Gent & Beuningen vers la France.

La Hollande a avisé de donner ces 10,000 ryx-dalers à la ville de Munster; mais rien n'est encore resolu dans la generalité.

Le sieur Downing a faite plainte d'injustice, que l'admirauté d'Amsterdam a faite sur deux navires Anglois: cela est renvoyé à Amsterdam.

Le 25^{me} dito.

Encore aujourd'huy on n'a fait que de battre de la responce à donner au roy de France, sur la lettre: les provinces y consentent, mais la Frise seule point: cela n'empesche point la conclusion: mais l'on voudroit volontiers antedater la lettre; car on y parle, comme s'ignoroit encore la mort du roy de Suede; & pourtant le president de present ne veut pas la conclurre, & le président de la semaine passée ne veut pas la conclurre pour la raison susdite. Je pense, qu'enfin demain cela se conclurra. La responce à l'ambassadeur de France est un cas à-part.

La Hollande n'a pas encore produit leur avis provincial sur l'affaire de Munster; mais le contenu est, qu'on leur donnera par provision ces 10,000 ryx-dalers, & qu'on traitera avec eux de Munster touchant un subside par mois; toutefois qu'aussy on tentera de moyenner un bon accord entre la ville & l'evesque.

La Hollande n'a encore rien produit touchant les ambassades ny equipage, &c.

La responce de l'ambassadeur de Portugal est longue: il n'offre point des terres, mais offre de venir en traité pour accorder quelque chose touchant le payement de debtes, qui montent à des millions: item, de partager le commerce: item, contient quelques eluciations des offres precedentes. On dit, que l'ambassadeur le fera imprimer, estant prolix & en Latin.

Le 26^{me} dito.

La Hollande a produit leur avis sur l'affaire de Munster, contenant (outre ce que j'ay dit) que ces 10,000 ryx-dalers serontournys par les plus voisines & adjacentes; aussy à condition de ne s'engager point avec autres princes. A quoy les autres provinces ne s'entendent pas.

La responce de Portugal est leue, translatée, très-prolix. Demain sera conference là-dessus.

Des ambassades n'est encore rien produit.

La Hollande a consenty dans le 150,000 l. pour Dennemarc: mais ny la Zelande ny la Frise ne sont pas prestes.

De Witt to Nieupoort, the Dutch ambassador in England.

MY LORD,

Hague, 26. March, 1660. [N. S.]

Vol. lxvii.
p. 218.

WE perceive by your letters, that the affairs of England are still in an uncertain condition. I cannot imagine in what name the next parliament will be called, if so be they will not have it in the name of the keepers of the liberties of England. Your next will clear up this to us. I have once more moved in your behalf, to have leave to come over for a short while; but it would not be granted, in regard the present condition of affairs in England will not suffer it; besides the advantage the Swedish ministers will have in your absence to seduce the governors there.

Here inclosed I send your lordship the answer to the king of France, and the answer to the lord ambassador de Thou. I have no more to add, seeing you have not yet been able to make any progress in those affairs committed to your charge.

Mr. John Barwick to king Charles II.

 will be better now, that the new parliament is to be chosen; for this evening the secluded members, they say, and the rump, will dissolve, and leave in the intermission of parliament the counsell of state to governe with the lord generall Monck; and the militia is in the city of London reasonably well settled, and all the gentlemen are going downe into their respective countrys to settle the same, the act for the kingdom's militia being this afternoone come out of the presse. Yesterday upon the exchange, by order from the lord generall, as it was said, those words wrot in gold letters over the place, where the statue of our last gracious kinge stood, viz. Exit tyrannus regum ultimus, anno libertatis Angliae, &c. to bee by a paynter expunged, which was assisted by some soldiers, and consented to by the lowd shout and acclamation of the people then present. A good omen, I hope, to a future settlement of this nation in its pristine happiness. They say the rumpers bid great summes of money in many burrough townes to be elected in the next parliament. If it come to any thing, as it is many mens hope it will, they say, that Mr. Prinne in all things asserts the king's right, as without whom this kingdom can have no settlements; and old Mr. Edward Steevens is as playne in his assertion of the king's right. And indeed verry few tenir à Monsieur Thoma Bets marchand d'Hollande à Bruxelles.

An intercepted letter, probably from Sir Edward Hyde to Dr. Barwick.

SIR,

Brussels.
 March the 27th, 1660. 118.

I HAVE yours of the 9th, which still gives me occasion to commend the conveyance, Vol. lxvii.
 and since that your other of the 4th, though I conceive it contains some passages, which P. 226.
 happened after that day. Concerning the former, which came last, I shall say nothing by way of reply, but thank you heartily for it, it being an excellent account, and very much to my information; and I must tell you, the king looks over no designs with more satisfaction than he doth yours.

If 185 hath shewed you the answer he received from the king by 9, 2, you will by that see, how the king desires the business should be carried on; and that though his friends may consult apart, that he doth not wish any resolutions should be taken and prosecuted without the privity of those, who are now immediately trusted and commissioned by his majesty, and of which some of them may be, if they please, who by communication may carry on all with great consent; and I hope that 501, who knows the king's great esteem of lord 568, will carry him so discreetly towards him, and shew him all the king's instructions, that my lord will not only be satisfied in what relates to himself, but in the whole business; and that as much is done towards the well ordering of it, as can be at such a distance. And then my lord will find himself enough qualified to interpose with any persons, who can bear a good part in the service; and to promise them such satisfaction in all respects, as they can reasonably desire. I do not comprehend, how any thing sent by 516 can raise any difficultys in the consultation. For whatever great assistance we may hereafter expect from the 2 crowns, those we can depend on for the present are very moderate, and on the part of France onely by connivance. I cannot doubt, but that mine of the 24th, under cover to 667, and my former of the 16th by honest 36, are come safe to you, and then 355 hath all you desire. I will not enlarge concerning 641, 378, or 221, because I suppose Thomas (who went the last night from hence for 862) will be shortly with you, and I have inough instructed him those particulars, which I hope he will remember. I pray remember me kindly to 466, 42, 290, the lawyer, and assure him of my service in all occasions. I will by the first opportunity send you the king's for 732 or 380, and 292; but the king hath already writt to my lord 324, which was sent by 323 to his . . . to be delivered by him, who had sent for it, and who I presume is well esteemed by my lord and lady. And the king did in that, as I do now to you, recommend 498 to my lord, who without doubt in many respects is very fit to be employed in the martial part in 314, 705; and you know the superstition of our countrymen, who will be much moved to see 314 defended by the same man, for the king, who did there so much mischief against him. And you may be most confident, the man is as honest and worthy as lives.

I pray tell your dear cousin, (to whom I shall write myself by the first opportunity) that it is out of my kindness to him, that I do not propose any part to him to act himself, till he finds the season ripe for him to appear; but that the king wishes he should be always with lord 562, except he affects somewhat . . . and then if you let me know it, I presume he will receive satisfaction. I like 492 last carriage towards his officers in their new combination better than any thing I have before heard of: and I hope he will quickly discern, that it is time for him to declare his inclinations towards the king in compliance with the sense of the kingdom, which would have a great impression upon many, and so would be of the greater merit in him. If the lords could be brought in, I should think they would be . . . committing some few desperate persons, who would be always disturbing them; and who can only be kept from doing hurt by being in prison, and for whom they may afterwards interpose, as they see cause; and then there might easily be a treaty, and suddenly agree on all particulars, which are necessary for their security, and referr as much as they please to be settled afterwards by a free parliament; and this would be the wisest course they could take. I shall be very glad to hear, that any good impressions are made on 452, and dispose him to the king's service. And I need not bespeak you to confirm your cousin; but for their opinion of the king's being abused by former treatys, I do assure you upon my credit, all, that was ever yet proposed from thence, was so without foundation of reasonable hope; that the king never gave ear farther to it, than by returning thanks for their good affections, and desiring they would retain them for a more favourable conjuncture. And this I do assure you upon my credit, whatever they think, or other men have made of it.

715 is so considerable, that I wish him well disposed, and I should expect from him, (which would not be an ill season) after he hath done all he can to erect a republic, and finds there

A.D. 1659. will be a necessity of calling in the king, that he should then oppose all extravagancys to be put upon him, and press, that all should be settled upon the old foundations, which the law can only support, their own securitys being provided for. And he may merit exceedingly by that thing, and is like to prevail far, especially if he can draw his friends 752 and 761 to the same concurrence, who have enough manifested, that they are not enemys to a single person; and they can never be secure under any other than the right one, whom they would love, if they knew. What I have heretofore said concerning himself will be punctually made good, and he shall have it in his own power to make good conditions for his friends. You have reason to wish, that poor 778 may not be deceived by 821; but there is no remedy, when men think they understand better than they, who must needs see more. Let him alone, and take no notice.

The whole matter is, as you say, so ridiculous, as methinks none of his friends received more evidence; though God knows we have much more, and shews how men of witt, when they become ill, loose their witts too. Would you beleived, that 821 and 761 have long combined to serve the king, and joined together for the pulling down of Richard? But this onely to yourself. Poore, and upon my conscience honest, 221 is here, and horribly ashamed, and returns this night with no other, but the verbal answer; that if 761 takes the king's service to heart, and appears fully for him, much may be believed of 821 his good intention, how unskillfull soever he hath been in carrying on such an intrigue so many years, without informing the king, or any of his friends, of it. But I must charge you again, take no notice of this, or of 221 being here, except their own discourse give occasion: and then you have fair room enough. I shall long to be assured, that this is in your hands. God blefs you, and,

S I R,

Your most affectionate servant,

In the possession of Hugh Gregor esq;

I AM assured by a person, through whose handes this will come to you, that you have more than ordinary affection to promote my service and interest, and that you have much credit with those, who can contribute very much towards it: all which I believe, and am therefore very willing to give you my thanks, and to assure you, that as your frindes shall have all the reason to rejoyce in the service they shall do for me, that my kindnesse and power can give them, so you shall finde your particular accounte in it; and that I will be alwayes

King Charles II. to William Morrice esq;

Brussels, 8. April, 1660. [N. S.]

In the possession of Hugh Gregor esq;

I WRITT to you on the 27th of last month upon the general information I had of your good affection; but I have since received a more particular accounte of the many obligations I have to you, and the greater power you have to do me service, and your greater partes, which you have manifested in several occasions. I cannot chuse of good successe, by the blessing of God, in what you are now endeavouring, since I am sure I shall be founde to have the very same good ends, which you propose to yourselfe; and that no man in the kingdom can more, if so much, desire the advancement of the Protestant religion, and the peace, and happiness, and honour of the nation, than I do, or is more an Englishman. The person, who will deliver this, and who is so well knowne to you, will desire you in my name to deliver some letters to your frindes, and your advice in what is farther to be offered to them on my parte; since you cannot imagine, but that I must be very desirous to gratifie and oblige them to any degree, that I shall finde will be acceptable to them; and therefore whatever he and you shall agree as fit to offer, I will make good; and he may be as confident as of any thing in this world, that he shall always finde all imaginable satisfaction and constancy in my kindnesse to him. To yourselfe I will only say, that the good offices you have and will perform for me, are so meritorious, that they deserve all the trust and and confidence I can repose in you; and therefore you will easily believe I must be alwayes A.D. 1659.

very kinde to you, upon which you may depende; and that whilst I live, I will never expect any thing from you, but what becomes a true lover of his country, and you shall allwayes

SIR,

Brussels, 27th March, 1660 [N. S.]

THESE two posts I had not a word from you. Lately I have heard from our friend Vol. lxvii.

time to carry for England. When your master goeth, as most believe will be very soon, unless the devil be in it, then you shall find the benefit of being faithful, and obliging honest persons. In the mean time God preserve you.

Lord Broghill to secretary Thurloe.

DEARE SIR,

I AM hartily glad we are now restored to a government, which invites you to that employ- Vol. lxvii.
ment you soe longe and meritoriously discharged, and which on their invitation you decline p. 219.
not to reassume. I wish you may have as much satisfaction in it, as I am confident the publike will reape advantage by your discharging of it.

I hope, whatever a free parliament shall enact, we shall all actively or passively obey. I am fully perswaded, the army is of that resolution; and indeed, wher can we rest, if that be not our foundation? Whatever supream authority we owne, we ought to obey. Possibly I am not without verry sensible apprehensions; but if I must perish, let me perish in a way of duty, where inward supports will not fayle, when outward ones doe. I heare we are much misrepresented in England, as persons, that intend to set up for ourselves, and to make Ireland a back door to let in Ch. Ste. into England, and thereby at one blow cut up by the roots the precious rights we have bin soe longe contending for *. I profess, Sir, I know nothing farther from the thoughts of all my acquaintance and friends; for interest as well as duty will keep us from soe ruinous a wickedness.

I longe to heare what is become of my worthy friend the controler. I wish my going 1000 miles on foote would serve him; I would endeavour it, as ill a footman as I am. I had this day a letter from honest Matchevill, who summons me to meet him this next parliament; but I can scarce beleve a new one will meet soe soone, they that now sitt haveing soe much to doe. I heere present you with a declaration of that province now under my care, for want of a better to command ther. However the expressions are, I am certayne the meaning is good.

Doubtless the death of the kinge of Swedland is of greate advantage to his enemyes, and prejudice to the Protestant cause through the world. I hope God will close that breach, which he himselfe hath made, and raise a new assertor of that cause.

I shall endeavour to give you a constant account of all things, and, God willinge, never cease to be,

DEAR SIR,

Your most affectionate, and most obliged

The commonwealth's-men wonder to see generall Monk declare for a commonwealth, and yet put so many places of strength into the hands of those, that are not much enamored of that government. For Sir Hor. Townsend is governor of Lyn, Ch. Howard of Carlisle, Tolhurst of Newcastle, Moris of Plymouth, Sir Pet. Killegrew of Pendennis castle. His great work now is to modell his standing army. And it is no small happiness, that most of his officers are post-nati to the spoyles both of the church and crown; for there the shoe pincheth most.

Extract of the resolutions of the states general.

Tuesday, March 30. 1660. [N.S.]

UPON debate it is resolved to appoint the embassade extraordinary for France, and Vol. lxvii.
for the exercise of that charge monsieur de Ghent, and Beuningen, and . . . are p. 245.
named upon the instructions, which shall be drawn up to this effect, according to the instructions of their high mightinesses. The deputy of Friseland persists in the opinion of his principals presented the 9th instant March, and inserted in the register of the resolutions of their high mightinesses, that so he may leave the debate thereof to the said lords his masters. In another of the same date they have appointed monsieur Merode, Amerongen, and . . . to go to Spain.

gentleman to take his leave of me, whom this day is gon for Flanders with a message from Morden, Massi, and Brown, and divers of the cheefe officers of London, to the king, wherein they do declare, that generall Monk hath vowed to them, he will bring in the king; yet they say, they will not trust him, for he will play fast and loos. The owld members towld my friend, that they and sum of the armi would sudenly agree. Thay towld him; the day the hows broke up, the generall sent them a letter thay showld not go on to settle the malisha, but withall sent them a private message. The leter was only to pleas his officers; and when he hath pickt and culd his army, and put new ofiscers in, he tells them he then will declare for the king; but my frend tells me, they do not beleev him, and ar resolved to goe on with the design, which I fear is nought; for he towld me, if sum know half so much as he, Brown would not be at liberti six days. They will do all they can to invite the gennerall to stai at London; but what ends they hav, I know not. Sir, DES ambassadeurs n'est encore rien rapporté. L'ambassadeur Boreel a travaillé en Hollande pour avoir qualité d'ambassadeur extraordinaire vers France; mais Amsterdam a travaillé pour le faire aller ambassadeur extraordinaire en Espagne, ce qui seroit cependant planter le sieur Beuningen en France; mais ny l'un ny l'autre n'est pas encore reussy. Le sieur Renswoude travaille pour faire adjoindre son fils, comme ambassadeur, aux autres ambassadeurs.

Il est apparent, que le sieur Veth sera rapellé (de son gré) au sindicat de Midleborgh pour l'année future estre bourgemaistre illeque; et bewinthebber de la compagnie d'Ostende.

Contre le gré et l'expectation de Hollande, tel Smith a eu la pluralité de voix pour le consulat de Smirne.

On minute une garante separatim & conjunctim pour la paix au Nort.

Mardy.

Les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc ont par un expres memoire representé le tort, que les mediateurs ont fait à leur roy, et principalement que les deputés de cest estat ont susstrait les secours à leur dit roy, faisant retirer le Ruyter avec sa flotte, requerants qu'on veuille continuer en l'assistance, et laisser le Ruyter agir comme auparavant. Sur cela il y aura conference. Tous estats generaux demonstrent d'estre marrys de ce que les deputés ont fait; toutefois on ne la pas desadvoue.

Ce matin en fin on a nommée les ambassadeurs les sieurs de Gent, Beuningen, et un de Zelande vers France; item les sieurs de Merode, d'Amerongen, et un de Frise vers Espagne. En l'affaire de Munster en fin est conclu pour ces 10,000 ryxdalers, qui seront fourny purement et simplement, sans toutefois encore declarer d'ou on les prendra.

Mecredi.

Le plus notable d'aujourd'huy est, qu'il y a eu conference sur les affaires et plaintes de Dennemarc, pour voir s'il y a encore moyen de changer ce qui est fait à Elseneur. Tout tant qu'il y a de membres de l'assemblée demonstrent un grand regret et degoust de ce qui s'est fait, et l'avocation de la flotte de Ruyter. L'on fait mine de grande inclination de vouloir renverser cela; mais je crains fort, que ce ne soit qu'une grimace, et que sous main la Hollande fera bien aise, que le commerce et navigation en la mer Baltique se reestablishisse. Le resident de Pologne aura fait un plainte aussy serieuse de ce, que ce sieur Vander Honart auroit memoire un peu contra decorum, ou contre le respect de sa majesté de Pologne; esse modum in rebus; et qu'il faille traiter les testes couronnées avec plus d'observance.

J'entens, que le Brandenbourg fera aussy une plainte contre la conclusion d'Elsenur.

Jeudy.

Le sieur resident de Pologne a donné à ce matin un memoire sur le sujet de la pacification, plaintive et aucunement reprochante. J'entens, qu'il sera imprimé, si qu'on l'aura bientost.

Il y a eu derechef conference sur les affaires de Dennemarc. On considere deux choses: 1. de prevenir, que le Suedois ne fassent elusion, recommençant à courresus aux Danois: 2. à ce que quelque satisfaction soit fait aux Danois; et si les Suedois vouloient relascher Bornholm, les Danois se contenteront. Et sur ces deux points on travaillé. Et aux Danois se fera quelque communication là-dessus.

L'on travaille aussy sur l'achevement des affaires de l'ambassade de France; sur cela ayant esté nouvelle conference avec l'ambassadeur Boreel, et conference pour achever l'instruction.

Je me tiens pour bien informé; que tout ce du Nort n'est qu'un grimace; et qu'on desire, que la paix s'y face en la façon comme l'on a commencé. Aujourd'huy est encore donné un memoire des ambassadeurs de Dennemarc; mais cela ne servira de rien.

La

Vendredi.

A.D. 1659.

La conference, qui s'est tenue avec les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc, a esté pour représenter la nécessité de la paix, et pour induire le Dennemarc à la paix.

Toutefois aussi que la Suede se doit et declarer et comporter sans caption ny duplicité.

Car on n'entend pas, que la Suede desire pretendre la moindre chose en recompense ou equivalent de Dronthem; qu'autrement on recommencera d'agir avec la flotte.

Et quoyque les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc ont fait grandissime plainte; si est ce qu'on leur a respondu sur les fondements des lettres, qu'on escrit tant au roy de Dennemarc qu'aux deputés.

Ceux de Dort par deputation ont fait grande plainte aux estats generaux de ce que à Liege on a imposé un 60. denier, et autres nouvelles impositions sur les marchandises, qui d'icy passent par-là; ce que touche aussi les habitans de Brabande ou de Luxemburg.

An intercepted letter of Dr. Gough.

Paris, 31st of March, 1660. [N.S.]

I AM heartily sorry to find by your letter, that you have been so indisposed as to keep your bed of late; but you comfort us with the assurance, that the danger is past. In short, not to trouble you now with long letters, we are well, and pray to God you may be so suddenly, that you may partake of the joy, which we flatter ourselves with here, that the king is shortly to return to his throne, and we shall see better days. I beseech God to protect you and our Catholic religion from the cruel and blind zeal of them, that are likely to govern now.

Mr. Downing, envoy in Holland, to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Hague, the 2. April, 1660. N. S.

THEIS are onely to let you know, that the post from England being not this weeke come, I am wholly ignorant of your commands for the business of the Sound. I forbear to send those papers, which I have received from thence, which have passed betweene the ministers of this state and the Swedes, because it is not to be doubted, but that you have them from the ministers of England there. I long much to have your thoughts concerning that business, which many are of opinion is at an end; but others think, that many difficultys may yet arise. I was yesterday with the Danish ambassadors, and find them infinitely angry, if they know how to help themselves; and on the other hand there are heere, who

A.D. 1659. who think, that when the Swedes, by the coming of their ships out of Landschronen, shall have provided their places in Pomerania and elsewhere, they will a little more stand upon their points. I am,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Your most faythfull humble servant,

G. DOWNING.

There is a captain of a katch, which came with the Hampshire frigate with some convoys from the Downes, who is just now come hither to me, who tels me, that he saw a letter in the Downes from vice-admiral Lawson to the commander in chief there, dated the 10th March old stile, in which it was written, that it had been put to the voate in parliament, whether they would be for monarchy or a commonwealth government; and that it was carried by 20 voyces, that they would be for a commonwealth government.

Mr. Downing to the president of the council of state.

MY LORD,

Hague, April 2. N. Stile, 1660.

Vol. lxvii.
p. 256.

MY last gave you an account of matters to the rising of the assembly of the states of Holland, in whose absence there is seldom any thing of moment done in this countrey.

I doubt not, but that you have an account of what is passed in the Sound between the Swedish and Hollandish ministers, as to an absolute cessation of acts of hostility by sea, at which the Hollandish ministers seem to be extremely troubled; and have thereupon presented two memorials to the states general, copyes whereof I have heerein inclosed. And it a little the more troubles them, that the Hollanders have procured an absolute cessation by sea for themselves, without including so much as the Danish merchant ships, who will by the sudden coming out of the Swedes men of warr be in danger to be most of them taken. Besides, the Swedes will have the opportunity of providing Wisemar, Sterin, and other their places in Pomerania and elsewhere, with all necessarys. But the truth is, this countrey are very weary of the troubles of the east; and they hope, that they are now very near an end; and the truth is, the ministers of this state at Copenhagen have by this unexpected suspension of arms so farr offended the king of Denmark, and the people of this countrey also, as that their very person will be in great danger, if the peace should not suddainly follow.

The states of Holland will be heere about a fortnight hence, the which it is my duty to let you know, that I may against that time receive your orders, particularly in relation to the affair of the Sound and Portugal; and to what issue you would have them conducted. I am,

MY LORD,

The post from England is not yet come this weeke.

Your lordship's most obedient humble servant,

G. DOWNING.

Yesterday night the deputys of this state had a conference with the ambassadors of Denmark, wherein they did declare, that this state thought it reasonable, that their king should accept the conventions made at the Hague; but as to the damages, which he hath suffered this winter, that they would endeavour to obteyne him some reparation. The minister of Brandenburg had yesterday a conference with the deputys of this state, desiring that they would interpose their mediation for the freeing of that place from the great danger it is now in by the troops of the king of France.

The deputys of this state for the affairs of France are this next week to go to the French ambassador here, to conferr with him about the late tax upon foreign vessels in France.

De Witt to Nicuport, the Dutch ambassador in England.

MY LORD,

THE post of this week from England is not yet arrived, so that I have received none from A.D. 1659. you since the 19th of the last month.

The last letters, which their H. and M. L. have received from the lords commissioners extraordinary of this state in Denmark, have very much perplexed this state; and their H. and M. L. have thought good to return an answer to the said lords commissioners, as also to the king of Denmark.

The business of Munster we hope in a short time will be brought to a happy accommodation.

We know not what to imagine of the staying away of the post. Some conjecture new troubles to be in England. A few days will clear up things. In the mean time I have nothing more considerable to add, and am, &c.

MONSIEUR,

ICY l'on n'a pas encore rien eu d'Angleterre de ceste semaine.

L'on présume une guerre civile.

Quant à la guerre du Nordt, on la tient apaisée.

L'on escrit au roy de Dennemarc une lettre serieuse, pour luy dire, qu'il est non seulement conseillable, mais absolument necessaire, qu'il accepte la paix.

L'on fera neantmoins appliquer tous les bons offices, qui sont possibles pour faire avoir quelque satisfaction au roy de Dennemarc des dammages, qu'il a paty, depuis que le roy de Suede est refusant de la paix. Mais cela ne sera qu'un persuasif, point compulsoire. Je suis

An intercepted letter to lord chancellor Hyde.

MY LORD,

THE militia being put into new hands, and a new parliament to be in April, invites Vol. lxvii. me to tell you, that our just cause hath now a far more chearful countenance than ever, P. 199. the people generally seeming much to desire our king, which is so out of the consideration of their own interest, and the best loadstone of this world's affairs, who can neither trade, sow, reap, or enjoy any thing peaceably without him, as I wish they never may, unto which refuge their own various, senseless governments have at last drove them; which must be persecuted by the choice of honest, worthy persons for the next convention: to the effecting whereof we intend to use our utmost endeavours. On my observation in severall counties, I cannot mislike the general inclination of the subject; but I find, that endeavours are using by the officers of the army, and others, to persuaade the general to declare against admitting of his majesty, which yet is prevented by the care and persuasions of some prudent, vigilant persons.

London, 23. March, 1659.

Mr. R. Bradshaw to secretary Thurloe.

HONOURED SIR,

I MAKE bold to inclose the petition, which I shewed unto you, haveing annexed copies of Vol. lxvii. the report of the committee, and order of the counsell, humbly and ernistly intreatinge P. 265. you to endeavour to take the first opportunity of presenting them to the counsell, and to endeavour

A.D. 1659. endeavour the obteyning of an order for the money due to me. None knowes my case so well as yourselfe, how often I have exposed my life in the service of the state, and what odium I have derived upon myself for my faithfullness from the enemies thereof. If therefore, after all, I should lose such a somme, being more then I have got in my 17 yeares service at home and abroad, but not the haulfe of what I have lost in the first of the warre, my case would be unparalel'd. Truly, Sir, if I get not satisfaction in this interval, I dispaire of obtayninge it hereafter. Therefore I hope you will stand my friend, in doing what possible to be done, before the opportunity be lost. I humbly pray you alsoe to remember to speake with and satisfye Mr. Knightley of the unjustness of the clamour of the merchants against me, that he obstruct not my business at the counsell. I have a promis from my lord general Monck, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Sir John Holland, collonel Morley, collonel Thomson, Mr. Weaver, and others of the counsell, to be my friends. If I cannot obtayne the whole at present, because of the want of money, I beseech you, at least, obtayne me an order for some considerable part thereof, for my necessary supply; and the rest, as money comes in. If I had any employment, that would bear my charge, or that the counsell would think fit to confer any upon me, I could the better bear the want of so great a somme. Haveinge thus layd open my condition to you, I beg your speciall favour, and profess myselfe,

HONOURABLE SIR,

Your very humble and thankfull servant,

23. March, 1659.

RIC. BRADSHAW.

I beseech you acquaint my lord St. John with my case, and make him my freind.

A paper delivered to the Dutch ambassador.

Vol. lxvii.

p. 258.

In the handwriting of secretary Thurloc.

THE councill of state having, since your excellency's paper of the $\frac{2}{12}$. March, 1659. delivered unto them at your last publick audience, received from the English commissioners and plenipotentiarys at Copenhagen, a large and full account of those transactions, which have been in Denmark for reconciling the 2 northern kings, and in what state those affairs were at the time of the sending away that dispatch, which was the 25th last; they thought it necessary in itself, and very agreeable to that confidence, wherewith England and the United Provinces have proceeded towards each other in the management of that business, to communicate to your excellency, the ambassador of the lords the states generall, the true matter of fact, as they have received it from the said plenipotentiarys, and which is conteyned in the paper annexed hereunto; with this further, that the sayd plenipotentiaries, upon the king of Denmark's annulling his declaration of the 4th. Sept. and refusing to make peace with the king of Sweden, upon the terms and conditions agreed upon and propounded by the three mediating states, have demanded of the commissioners of the lords states generall of the United Netherlands, that, according to the treaty's made at the Hague, the assistance given to the king of Denmark by the United Netherlands be forthwith withdrawn, as from the refuser of the peace; which demand being transmitted in writing to the councill, who have caused a copy thereof to be also annexed hereunto. And as the councill have given us order also to make this free communication to your excellency, of what they have received from Copenhagen; soe they are also pleased, that we should declare to your excellency, that this state is still resolved to hold to, and observe on their part, the respective treaty's and agreements made and concluded at the Hague, the 21. May, 24. July, and 4. August, 1659; all which have been ratifyed and confirmed by the lords the states generall of the United Provinces; not doubting, but that their lordships have the same mind and intention; and likewise, on their part, will fulfill and observe the same treaty's, and co-operate and joyn with this state and France in all things, which may tend to the promoting of the said peace, upon the conditions contained therein. And in order thereunto, in case the king of Denmark shall continue to refuse the peace, as aforesaid, that the United Provinces doe withdraw all aid and assistance, according to what hath been demanded by the English plenipotentiarys in the Sound, in pursuance of the treaty's at the Hague.

And this is that, which we are commanded to insit upon with your excellency; and to know what the resolutions of your superiors are therein; there being no other difficulty now remaining (in the judgment of the councill) in bringing this unhappy war to a happy conclusion.

I Omitted writing the last post, because I had nothing to say; and this I am more at a loss, as well as many others; for, to our great admiration, no post is yet arrived; whence variety of conjectures are made; so that if it had not been to acknowledge the receipt of your last, I had now been silent; we being all here at a gaze.

IF it had not been I was pressed by him, that gave me this answer, I would have forbore writing, till I had heard from you; though I am much concerned to have your friend Peters's answer concerning the match propounded to him long since. This week we have heard nothing from your side; whether it be the storm, or the disturbance the secretaries may give, I know not; but I hope it is the first. Let me hear from you as soon as you can. God keep you.

LOVING FRIEND, and dear SIR,

Salute.

Brussels, 3. April, 1660. [N. S.]

IT much rejoiced me to receive yours of the 22d. of February, in that it brought me the assurance of your recovery, though it were the first news of your indisposition, that came to your servant's hands and knowledge. Indeed I should think, that air agreed not well with you, that you no sooner breathe it, but you fall into some indisposition. Did not I conjecture at some more legal motive to it, which time, you may be sure, will certainly overcome, if you will but contribute your patience towards your obtaining your longed for desires, which I hope are not far off from enjoying, letting me assure you, your godfather continues in very good health, and thinks of nothing more than making you happy, and settling you in the possessions you have aimed at. By his favour, and for his better making over to you his estate, he purposes to take the advice of his friends and lawyers with you, who have been of his counsell all along; and hopes to compass matters so by Easter term, as to be with you before it be done.

Vol. lxvii.
p. 267.

I presume your sister hath acquainted you particularly of the match preferred her by the great Don, that hath been long a courtier or servant to her; so that I shall only say, that she hath been so discreet in the management of her love, as it hath been a main inducement to bring him the more eagerly on. Indeed, the great proffers, that have been made her, (besides the temptations of the enjoyment of a world of jewels) are such, as no lady in Christendom would well refuse; and her consent and acceptance to his full and large proffers are pleasing to him, as you never saw a man more overjoyed than he is; yet the day of rejoicing and celebrating of the nuptials will not be this month.

Darby is abroad again, and Harrison is well, and Tom Barbe is here, and kisses your hands. I shall give you no further, but that I hope to be with you shortly, to save you the trouble of my tedious lines; yet pray let me hear from you, till you receive more particulars to forbear writing; my remove being yet on such uncertain terms, as, till I see how my progress will go with me there, I dare not stir. So wishing you all health and happiness, &c.

 patch we have sent to the English plenipotentiarys in answer to their letters, coppies Thuroloe.
 whereof you will likewise herewith receive; and upon the receipt thereof, you shall in such manner, and by such meanes, as you shall judge most proper, communicate unto the lords the states generall the intentions of this state, as they are exprest in these papers, and conferre with them, or such as they shall delegate on that behalf, that they may take the same resolutions, and give suitable orders and instructions to their commissioners in the Sound; and such answers as you shall receive from them, or what you can otherwise discover of their minds in reference to any of these particulars, you shall carefully make known to us, that you may thereupon receive such further direction as shall be necessary.

Major-general Massey to Sir Edward Hyde.

My verry good LORD,

London, 27. March, 1660.

In the possession of Joseph Radcliffe, of the Inner
 Temple, esq;

BY this bearer I have presumed to kisse your lordship's hand most humbly in these, and to begg your commands by his returne. I have writ your lordship the lesse here, because I intend by post to give you some small accompt of things as I shal be able in this minute of night-tyme I have only to work in; for I intended a day's stay longer here, when the mallice of my enemyes, the breede of the rumpe, through the prudentiall cowardice of my seclused fellow-members, have caused me to walke incognu, and still most by owle-light. But some letters comeinge this evening to my hand, I find a necessity of my journey betymes in the morning, to goe downe towards Gloucester to get myself in for one of the next so miscalled parliament, and I have not beene free from all care to get my neighbour Mr. Jennings in for another, if possible, who went out of towne yesterday to his sister's to take the ayre. I have beene exceedingly angry at him, that he would never be got to write any thing in season. He hath wrote somethinge concerning the elections, but so late ere we could get him to it, that it will now signify nothings, London haveinge already

Id. Mordaunt,

chosen. I could tell your lordship a pleasant story of 473, that he is fallen into intrige with

Id. Lawderdail and Sir William Waller,

Heads of advice to king Charles II.

In the possession of Joseph Radcliffe, of the Inner Temple, esq;

I. THOUGH it be a faire day, yet how the evening may prove, is not knowne. I therefore humbly desire your majestie to walk with that weariness, that if things succeed otherwaies then well, you may not be in a wors condition then now you are.

II. You may remember 'twas once the generall opinion, that the army would restore your father; and he then sent me word they were all his owne. I returned this, that I had dived into the breasts of those, that had great power with the cheif of them, and found they meant nothing but to juggle with him, and sent him word accordingly. I mention this, that too hasty a beleif be not given to faire pretences, but still to provide for the worst.

III. It is most certainly true, that Presbitery is a very ill foundation to monarchy, and therefore it must be said with great care and circumspection. You know what your father suffered by them, and yourself alsoe in Scotland, whether when you went, though all were for it, I was absolutly against it, and gave my reasons to one, who I suppose now attends you, which experience hath proved true.

IV. I

IV. I sent to your majesty by a doctor of divinity, a good while before your going into A.D. 1660. Scotland, that my humble advice was, you should goe into Ireland. He sent me word, that you liked of it; and I wish you had so done, for then in all probability you had bene in England before now. I speak not this, that I would have your majestie decline any reasonable offers, (God forbid!) but that you be cautious in dealing therein.

V. By any meanes, be not perswaded by any from England upon their single account, to yield to any thing highly prejudiciall to you, though they assure your majestie never so much, that in a little time it shall be redressed; for there is not one of that power and wisdom, that is able to effect what he promises.

VI. The conditions (if any) questionless will be hard, and I beleive much after the nature of those sent your father at the isle of Wight. The most dangerous one is, that of the militia, without which a king is scarce half himself; and though now they have it de facto, yet there is great difference between that and having of it de jure and de facto both, which they will have, when you please to confirm it to them. It would be very well, if you could gett it putt into such hands, the equall number whereof might be of your election; but however, if other things they propose be fitt for you to grant, I humbly advise you should not break upon that point. Soe desirous I am to have heere, and I hope busineses may be soe ordered, that the power of the sword may in a short time revert to you againe, to whom justly and truly it belongs.

VII. 'Twill be of great consequence, that you mainly insift upon a tolleration for all, as well Roman-catholiques as others, or att least to take of the penall statuts against them. There is not any thing you can doe will be of more advantage then this; for thereby you will satisfy all heere and abroad. Moreover, by doing thus, you will secure yourself against the Presbyterians and sectarys, by equally poisoning them with others of contrary judgments; for you may doubt, that the Presbyterians and sectarys will at length fall to their first principalls againe, and endeavour to make you at the best but a duke of Venice, if they see not a visible power to defende you. The like course hath maney times bene used by great princes, and never succeeded ill, when they saw one faction rise too high, to suffer a quite contrary to grow up to ballance it.

VIII. That your majestie give commande to your friends in England, that they should not vaunt, as if all was their owne, and that they will call all others to an account; and the same injunction laid upon your friends with you; for should they doe thus, it would turne to your extreeme prejudice; for their is enow, that lye at the catch for such advantages. I doe use all possible meanes to repress such speeches, and will so continue, and to do all other things, that I apprehende may be serviceable to you.

IX. I humbly submitt, whether it be not expedient, that you may acquaint the two crownes with the proposalls, when they come to you, and seeme to advise with them what you shall doe therein. This they must take as a high civility, and soe thereby your majestie may ingage them to se articles performed, which will be of mighty advantage to you; for if hereafter these heere faile with you, they are strictly tyed in honour to see them performed, and your majesty righted; and feare you may have neede of such friends.

X. That your majestie will be pleased to lett your concessions be only probationers, and be not ty'd to any, untill all be concluded; for els heereafter there may be advantage taken against you.

XI. Paradvventure it may seeme strange to any, that he, that has the power to doe so great and meritorious an act, will leave it to be done by others: if it shall be said, that he has the will, but not the power with his army, it is worthy of doubt, whether those, that will not ruled by him, will be by the succeeding assembly.

Mr. Longland, agent at Leghorn, to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONORABLE,

I HAV this week received from you a most welcom letter, that you ar again ingaged in Vol. lxvii. the publik servis of the state, whereat I much rejois, becaus I hav that assurance of your P. 301. honor's wisdom and integrity, that the whole nation will receiv much benefit by it. I se the long-parliament wer intended to dissolv, and a new one summoned to meet the twenty-fifth of April, which God giv his blessing unto, that thos nations may again enjoy a happy settlement. The princes and states of Italy (as indeed al Europe besids) ar in great expectation, what the result may be of this approaching parliament, which God direct with wisdom from above; for the wel settling the government of thes nations makes them perpetually happy or miserable.

I shall use my best endeavors to settle a correspondency at Rom; but as I writ your honour formerly, it must be the force of money, that must procure it, and that from som man of quallity, whos reward or pension must not be smale or mean ('tis that only must

Now I shall attend to know from your honor, what pension you intend to bestow on such a man; for, as I formerly advysed, a man, that can be brought to do this servise, will not stand to your courtesy, but will know what his reward shall be, whereof at least six moneths pay must be paid before-hand. This is the Italian way and humour. If the intelligence lyks you not, then it is in your pleasure to leav it. Here is advys by severall ways of the king of Sweden's death, which causes much rejoycing in Italy. Here ar reports, that the French send from Toulon twenty ships and ten gallyes to Calais, to join with som sea force of the king of Spain upon som design, to what intent not known. In what I may serv you, pleas to command,

RIGHT HONORABLE,

Your most humble and faithfull servant,

CHARLES LONGLAND.

Mr. Downing, envoy in Holland, to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONORABLE,

Sound,

Vol. lxvii.
p. 290.

THIS weeke I received two from you, and as to the affaires of the 459 153 104 33; England, if I may speak my opinion, I think it is clearly best for 547, that an end to the war between the king of Sweden and the king of Denmark over hastened; 487 231 150 160 42 43 390 536 207 537 be not 112 153 286 319 140 466 that trade 390 35; for that by the continuance thereof, 467 149 437 263 would certainly by English. little and little fall into the hands of the 41 105 56 362 143 65. Besides, if in this in England, the states general conjuncture of affairs; while all things are in such an unsettledness 339 447, 537 sea force at liberty, should have all their 142 43 14 305 251 219 362 231 133 475, as then they would, you will readily apprehend, that the consequence thereof may be dangerous; and besides the K. of Sweden peace with the king of Poland, emperor and the elector of Brandenburg 536 having made 427 500 538, and the 40 100 426 443 153 134 207 543 being included therein, which if it be not actually done, is yet in all probability very near the states generall and the K. of Denmark horse beat the K. of Sweden it; 535 207 537 will not be able to get 328 133 142 to 231 219 536 half out of those places, which he holds; and so there appears no pressing 321 146 in the the states generall, and K. of Poland, and the emperor, and the matter, as there would have been, in case 535 207, 538 207, 42 100 426, 443 155 elector of Brandenburg had joyned together, 134 207 543 319 34 71 113 339 279 477 311 468 133, of which there seems at the states generall dare present not any fear, 535 262 directly recede from the agreements, which were made the last year at the Hague, as long as France presseth, as it doth, the keeping to them, and that England also sticks to them, which certainly it is both yours and the king of Sweden's intrest, that you should do; for it is those agreements, which have kept off a generall league against the king of Sweden; and it is those agreements, which keepe this state from a retreating downright to the treaty of Bromsburg; which, if it were not for them, they would certainly doe; but that they fear, that in that case England and France would join together, and enter into a league with Sweden to assist him downright by land and sea; and therefore you see, that the lord Nieupoort doth not at all speak of receding from those agreements, but only of something by way of reparation to the king of Denmark for what he hath suffered by the not making of the peace this winter. But this is directly contrary to the expresse letter of the third clause of the convention made at the Hague the twenty-fourth of July last; the words whereof are as followeth: "Quod si a jam dictis oratoribus ante diem decimum quintum elapsum concordia inter ambos reges non aliis quam Roschildianæ pacis conditionibus integrari possit, ita tamen ut omnino illic mutetur tertius articulus, aut ut interpretatione commoda ei consulatur secundum ea, quæ Hagæ Comitum die xxi^o mensis Maii proximi elapsi sancita sunt, reliquum erit, ut dicti oratores classesque, tam Anglorum, quam fœderatorum Belgarum, paci inter regem utrumque constituendæ, idque ex præscripto fœderis Roschildiani graviter insudent, eoque contentantur, utque loca ab alterutro regum aut intercepta aut expugnata post initam Roschildiæ pacem restituantur, illique parti denuo accedant, cujus aut fuerant, aut ex auctoritate fœderis Roschildiani debuerunt fuisse, ita tamen ut prætura Dronthemienlis cum omnibus suis appertinentiis regi Daniæ addicatur, quamvis de ea Roschildiæ aliter sit conventum.

"Quantum

"Quantum ad reliqua, Roschildiano foedere vim roburque suum obtinente, nihilque ei A.D. 1660.
 "vel detracto vel addito, quo minus utrique parti ratum habeatur, ab exemptione mandetur.
 "Cæteroquin exacte observabuntur ea omnia, de quibus die Maii proxime elapsi xxi. Hagæ
 "Comitum convenit; ita tamen, ut per hæc conditiones non tollatur libertas agendi apud
 "regem Sueciæ, quo Daniæ regi quater centena talerorum imperialium millia nomine damni
 "in Guinea accepti promissa remittantur." Wherein you find a direct exprefs rule, how England and the United Provinces should demean themselves, in case the peace were not made within the said fifteen daies; to witt, that they should endeavour the reall executing and bringing about of what had been, and was thereby agreed between them concerning that matter, and nothing more or less. And for the 400000 ryx-dollars, the playne truth is, that in my instructions, which I had at that time, it was wholly left to me to have quitted to the king of Denmark as well as the 400000 ryx-dollars, as Dronthem; but yet
 I thought it my duty, not to do all I might do, but to make the saveingest bargaine I could for the king of Sweden; and so, although I was much pressed by this state, that that of the 400000 ryx-dollars might have been set down in as exprefs and obliging terms, as was that of Dronthem, yet I positively refused; but did consent, as you find it is sett down, that there should be a solliciting of the king of Sweden about it; and that upon this account, that had not some such clause bin heere sett down, the Dutch could not so much as have opened their mouth to the king of Sweden about it, in regard of the strictness of the foregoing words, which take away all liberty of changeing any thing, other than what is therein exprefsly set down. But yet this withall I told some of this state, that I would not sayle to write to some at London about this matter, and lay before them the poverty of the king of Denmark, and his nonsolvency of such a sum, that so they might be induced to concurr further with them therein. And this is the true matter of fact in relation to the 400000 ryx-dollars; and indeede the king of Denmark is very poore, and not in a capacity to pay it; so that indeed I think it were great charity it were forgiven him; but the question, whether the king of Spain will engage to oblige the king of Sweden to do it, 244 468 126 152 287 150 345 160 61 289 62 286 545 503 42, 107 308 is a thing 311 477 112 22 362 311 536 477 270 70 150 71 149 140 16 470 not well to be 133 287 40 109 466 37, that one should 267 138 431 138 44 even of another's almes work from England, 205 112 468 135 142 199 379 138 and 508 306 547, who have already 41 395 enough disgusted Sweden; the states general ar rich enough, 155 54 60 267 143 318 142 148 279 554; and besides, 535 213 40 442 43, 395 that post is worth all that to them; 152 35 60, and 467 428 346 158 416 149 64 199 477 468 102; and some of the Amsterdani me, they pay it, deputies: for 566 at that time said to 379, that 468 171 would rather 423 72 149 that should hinder the peace; then that 467 142 328 86 38 325 109 263 135 468 427. But the worst of this itates general Sweden, in vaine for them matter is, that 535 doe by all meanes endeavour to possess 554, that it is 339 515 305 to depend upon England; England Sweden's 468 102 477 263 426 110 37 in any kind 523 547; for that 547 considers not 554 turn England they 142 interests; and besides, that they can 105 154 133 109 547 which way 468 156 please; and this is a thing of very great importance and consideration. And truly, while the states general talke thus, England the French ambassador 535 463 82 77 147, 62 524 547 may altogether as well with 532 speake of an equivalent for the king of Sweden for Dronthem, 285 157 70 154 16 358 107 150 305 536 305 34 443 107 468 102, and that that reputation with the king would be the way to regain entirely their in a great measure 467 133 40 434 220 of Sweden, 500 536, and so in the conclusion bring the whole matter to a temprement; and in the the states general suffer by the continuance of mean time (to say no more) to be sure 535 140 154 49 50 286 239 468 254 108 475 108 153 205 251 408 those troubles; and of this you may rest confident, that if England will not in this matter yeild to the states general, the states general must yeild to England.
 547 503 395 149 339 469 371 148 466 134 170 43 199 34 477 555 535 386 France.
 168 39 199 32 477 547. In this you are sure of 549. And truly for my part I doe think, England regain their credit with Sweden that it is necessary for 547 quickly to doe something to 133 41 308 339 468 70 133 30 making of that peace; 133 44 267 466 500 554 before the 376 339 56 408 467 427; for after it wil be too late:
 ld. Nieuport may talke, there wil be no opportunity to do it. And however 527 377 463 82 77, and what may be in
 the

A.D. 1660. the answer of the states generall to me, which I send this post inclosed in myne to the president of the councel of state; 170 289 370 353 69 48 70 323 343 72 247 367 states generall change their note.
 535 29 319 106 311 468 70 140 395 466. But what you do in this kind, you must do without delay. The states of Holland will begin to be heere this next weeke; and it England would give 547 a generall reputation, to shew at this time something of 24 441 143 350
 Coyet very discontented, 390 144. And I find Mr. 254 171 289 154 39 441 267 142 254 110 466 109 instructions come to me he if England 466 38, that 343 255 477 379 at this time; and 324 faith, that 71 49 547 will not words make a peace as at least bestow a few 161 416 38 144 upon them, they must 376 15 427 217 468 they can, England.
 171 247, and accordingly heereafter consider 547.

As for the busines of 551, there is no appearance at all at present of 535 their sending the states generall
 fleet against it.
 any 49 358 289 16 308 339 143 156 71 151. I know not what may be, if the peace be made in the Sound; nothing to 426 231 375 339 468 459 155 108 36; for that then they will have 395 470 477 do with their ships; send 270 500 468 69 134 456 141; and they will be very much pressed to 454 some ships on the coast of Portugal, some ships and men to Brazeele.
 456 140 412 468 254 217 150 408 551, and 460 456 143 207 380 477 23 437 profit is 174 41 42 358; and you know, that the interest of 120 443 302 150 346 predomi-

 107 155 116 170 287.

Ch. Stuart,
 As for 572, I not know or beleive, that there hath been or is as yet any trinketing the itates generall and him;
 betweene 535 207 326; but there are some commissioners, who went from 61 42 108
 Bruxells princeps royal Orange; him 351 477 585 to the 570 about the busines of 416 205 311; and they were with 326 the princeps royal to interpose his interest with 570 about that matter. And this might give occasion to Opdam discourses of that nature. But this I do know, that 530 and diverse others of the greatest here addresse to him, 324 135 have in particular sent their 15 36 37 134 287 142 287 477 326, and that the states generall in very pathetique terms. And 535 are very wonderfully alarmed, and upon the coming post of every 432 ready to take some resolution what to do therein; for that they say, that if England will receive him in, too late in making 1547 503 135 278 43 72 155 326 339, it concerns them not to be 477 116 355 466 their peace with him; devil 339 376 339 57 468 67 135 426 427 500 326; for that they say, that if the 263 rule in England, they must fair 155 337 135 154 83 40 339 547 468 170 386 hold 298 71 135 with him. And
 pr. of Orange,
 moreover, however those, who are engaged against the 546, would rather have one to be family of Orange;
 there, who were not of the 298 381 362 408 416 205 311; yet all heere universally trade, England think it is best for them, upon the account of their 149 437 263, that 547 be under a king.

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Samedi, le 3. d'Avril, 1660. [N. S.]

LES sieurs Gent & autres sont requis d'aller voir cest après-diner le sieur ambassadeur de France, lui dire les raisons, pour quoi la France doit desister du last-gelt, alleguants les vieilles traités, par où est promis de ne pas charger ceux de cet estat plus haut, qu'on ne charge les François même. L'on a aussi resolu de donner une réponse au sieur Downing. Vol. lxvii. p. 288.

Dans la réponse à donner au sieur Friquet, est changé quelque chose, où estoit mis, comme si les deputés de l'evesque avoit fait ouverture; & y sera mis, que les lettres de l'evesque ont donné quelque ouverture aux traités d'amicable composition.

Dimanche, le 4. dito.

Hier en la conference le raet-pensionnaire a dit, que l'on avoit conceu la réponse donnée à l'ambassadeur de France, en termes doux & civiles, pour ne pas mettre dans la bouche du peuple semblable matiere de scandale, comme son excellence avoit fait par les termes rigoureux, dont son excellence s'est servi dans sa proposition, declarant que jamais cest estat n'avoit esté remontré de telle façon, que le roi Henry IV. en la proposition, que son ambassadeur Morlans avec Busenval (l'an 1593. on la trouvé en Barr) declaroit bien autrement; & qu'il estoit obligé à cest estat presque toute sa couronne.

Quant au last-gelt, dit, que par infinis traités, promesses, &c. estoit à cest estat promis, que ceux d'ici ne seroient plus chargés, que les propres subjects du roi. En fin parloient aussi de Bornholm, que cela devoit estre restitué au Dennemarc.

Quant au premiere, l'ambassadeur dit, que ce avoit esté par ordre expres de la cour de parler ainsi.

Quant au seconde, dit, que venant en France, l'ambassade auroit occasion de redresser cela.

Quant au troisieme, dit, que le Suede quiteroit bien Bornholm, mais en donnant quelque equivalent.

Au reste, l'ambassadeur interrompt à tout propos la harangue du sieur raet-pensionnaire, & ne souffroit pas les longueurs, toutefois donnoit bonnes paroles.

Lundi, le 5. dito.

Il y a eu debat pour une charge vacante dans le conseil de Flandre à Middleborg, comme aussi le consulat de Alicante.

Il y a eu conference sur l'instruction des ambassadeurs vers France, & y a discrepance touchant l'alliance à faire avec la France, craignant & prévoyant, que la France voudra opprimer ceux de la religion; & qu'en ce cas cest estat pouvoit être obligé d'assister le

A.D. 1660. roi contre ceux de la religion Reformée; & qu'au contraire l'Angleterre assistât ceux de la dite religion.

Tant y a, qu'il n'y a encore rien d'arresté en ces instructions.

Mardi, le 6. dito.

Le sieur Eickberg, ministre de cest estat à Berlin, estant mort, il s'est manifesté un & autre pour sa place; mais on a resolu de mortifier ce ministre, & deputer personne vers là, d'autant que aussi la paix se fait.

L'on a resolu d'escrire à l'admirauté de Zelande, Amsterdam, & Rotterdam, d'ordonner à leurs capitaines de mer de faire devoir de prendre certain pirate François, nommé Du Quesne, soi tenant environ Brest.

Le sieur Beuningen est venu sur la notification de ce qu'il est nommé pour l'ambassade pour France, & pour considerer aussi les ingredients de l'instruction.

Mecredi, le 7. dito.

Le resident de Groot a requis pour son altesse electorale Palatine libre exportation des peintures, que son altesse electorale a fait faire ou acheter ici; mais la Hollande n'y a pas voulu entendre sans la conference.

La responce sur les propositions & memoires du sieur Downing lui a esté porté seulement aujourd'huy par l'agent de Heyde. L'on a encore aujourd'huy eu conference sur l'instruction à former pour l'ambassade vers la France, & demain derechef s'en tiendra conference; mais touchant l'alliance à faire avec la France, il se trouve de plus en plus des difficultés. Le sieur vander Hoolck s'oppose contre cela crainte de la religion; car pour la prinse du chasteau d'Orange, & pour le bruit, que le roi de France en veut aussi à Geneve, & pour la demolition de Montauban, on a peur, que ce roi voudra entierelement opprimer la religion; & pourtant on a peur de s'engager.

Chez la princesse royale sera nouvelle, que le comte de Dona auroit rendu le chasteau pour 200,000 francs, & qu'outre cela le roi payeroit les ammunition & artilleries.

On a escrit, que le sieur ambassadeur Nieuport voudra ici demander sa dismission.

Jeudi, le 8. dito.

Les ambassadeurs de Dennemarc ont derechef présenté memoire, où ils font nouvelles plaintes contre les procedures des deputés au Sond; prétendants aussi la million, qui par le traité de Stetin (il y a bien cent ans) est constitué pour emende & mulcte sur celui, qui rompt le traité. Cela est encore mis en mains des commissaires.

Le conseiller de raet de la princesse royale a communiqué aux estats generaux des conditions, sur lesquelles le comte de Dona a rendu le chasteau d'Orange, dans lesquelles entre autre il a stipulé 200,000 francs pour lui.

La princesse douariere par le sieur Weyman au président a fait communiquer, qu'elle ne sçait rien de tout ce qui est passé à Orange, s'excuse de tout, n'en ayant rien reçu, promettant de faire communication, sitost qu'elle en auroit quelque chose.

L'instruction pour France hesite encore.

Vendredi, le 9. dito.

L'ambassadeur d'Espagne ayant fait notifier son retour par le sieur président, & offrir ses bons offices pour continuation de bonne correspondance; l'on a ordonné, que l'agent de Heyde ira en remercier son excellence, & dire, que l'estat se conjouoit de son heureux retour.

Et quoique l'ambassadeur n'en a pas fait faire mention, si est ce, qu'en l'assemblée a esté dit, qu'on taschera de faire fin de ces disputes pour l'Outre-Meuse, soit par l'interim, soit par partageement.

L'on a resolu d'envoyer le memoire des ambassadeurs de Dennemarc aux deputés de cest estat, pour faire devoir à obtenir ce que ce memoire dicte. On a derechef conféré sur les instructions; on tachera à en faire fin, & en rapporter demain, estant aussi maintenant fait quelque concept de celle des pour les ambassadeurs d'Espagne.

L'on continue à faire des conferences touchant l'affaire de Munster, quoique l'assemblée n'en sçache rien.

Le president a proposé, à fin que la Zelande & la Frise declarent les deux personnes, qui iront en France & Espagne. Item, à fin que l'equipage & l'ameublement soit préparé.

*A letter of intelligence.*France, 30. March, 1660.
9. April,

YOU had by my last of the 24th of March the articles touching the rendition of Orange to the king. Two days after the king, accompanied with some of the nobles, went thither; and having stay'd some hours there, returned again to Avignon, where the queen, Monseigneur, and the cardinal stayed for him. The court was engaged so far, and their hearts so much set upon this business of Orange, that no other issue could be expected from it; and the troops in Dauphiné being all ready to besiege it, it was to be seen, that they had a design to take it, whatever it cost them; so that there was a necessity, that the count of Dona (being abandoned by all) should accommodate this business. And that, which made him the rather do it, was, because the place was ill provided of all things, and could not have held out fifteen days: besides, the town was in very ill intelligence with the castle; and the states of Holland, which ought to have contributed most for its conservation, had writ to the king, that they would be guarantee, if the prince of Orange should approve what the count of Dona should agree with his majesty.

In the possession of the right honourable Philip Id. Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain,

The court goes on friday from Avignon to Nismes, and the troops, which are also marching that way, and intend to dismantle it, in revenge of some disorder, which fell out there between the Catholics and those of the religion, wherein a priest was hurt. This success of Orange is like enough to stir up some inconsiderate zeal to do other things; and the people of Languedoc being full of discontent, it may drive them to some extremity; to prevent which it's hoped, that the court will but fright them to get a sum of money out of them. At Monteban also the like is to be done.

The cardinal hath given order to fit up with all expedition all the ships and galleys, that are capable to put to sea at Toulon, which are nine in number, which carry from 60 to 35 guns, six big fly-boats, and two galleys; and for building of three ships, one of 70 guns, two of 44, and the other 30. These may be ready in six weeks. They are first to carry 5000 soldiers to land at Candy in the Venetian service, under the command of the duke of Modena, who either is or is to be made a nobleman of Venice; and as soon as this service is done, the ships are to return to Toulon, to take in 3000 excellent brass guns, and to carry them to Brest, where they are arming sixteen stout ships of war, who are to attend the arrival of this squadron; and France useth all endeavours to make themselves considerable at sea. They demand ten galleys of Genoa in lieu of those destroyed by them many years ago.

Marseilles continues in the former condition, having a garison in it of 6000 men, their privileges taken away, and the citadel almost finished: besides, the cardinal demands of them a million of livres, whereof 200000 to be paid down, the rest by 40000 per ann. They are so perplexed, that many families intend to leave the place.

The French army quarters some in Picardi, the rest in Champagne and in Normandy. They are all dispersed into villages by four and five. Their foot is about 5000, and their horse as many. There are no orders come for the reducing any of them; but instead thereof the prince of Condé's officers have orders to recruit, and are intended to assist the siege of Dunkirk, if need be, and if that other business be not accommodated by other counsels.

Aire and St. Omer are to be delivered to the French upon a new treaty.

THE king of Spain will be assuredly about the beginning of May upon the frontiers. Vol. lxvii. The Spanish slowness began to tire out the court; and if the marriage had been P. 300. deferred any longer, the king would have returned hither. But the infanta did so press the king her father, that he set out sooner than was expected. The king of Spain hath desired, that there may be but two persons at the interview and embrodery. The marshal of Turenne is made marshal general. I would fain know the certainty of your affairs, which make a great noise here; and every body doth believe, that this next parliament will call home their king.

MY LORDS,

10. April, 1660. [N. S.]

A.D. 1660. UPON the seventh of April was my last, to which I refer myself. Since, the lords commissioners have held daily conferences in the Oliva, where several debates have happened concerning the project, and the drawing of the articles. Amongst the rest the Poles will have inserted, Renunciat rex Poloniae jus suum, quod habet in Sueciam & Livoniam. The Swedes have prevailed, that these shall only stand, Renunciat rex prætensionem suam. Also the Poles thought to have got inserted, Gaudeant incolæ & advenæ Catholice religionis in Livonia exercitio religionis. The Swedes have obtained, that the word advena shall be left out. Yesterday the Swedes and Poles agreed, and have signed six of the chiefest points; and it is hoped, that the rest will be finished to-day, being of great consideration; and so the peace will be wholly concluded.

I RECEIVED yours with the inclosed, which I delivered. I cannot tell where I am like to be for the future; yet I hope it will not be long, before we meet at London; for I am of opinion we shall be there very shortly. The king removes to Breda on monday next, where the states of Holland will not be so unwilling to find him, as formerly, they having now a better opinion of his affairs.

I HAVE nothing to return you now, but my most humble thanks for your last of the twenty-third of March; which was soon seconded in all its parts by the arrival of some of your friends, who I hope at length wind up the bottom. What they can or will do in order to what you and I desire, I doubt not but you are better informed, than I can pretend to. But so it is, (as to my particular) I hope to visit you at London in a few weeks.

I AM verie forrie my occasions urge me thus to importune you; but you see the tyme lapses, and are not ignorant, how necessarie it is, that the council be moved to take some order for my redresse, which I cannot otherwise hope for, if no course be taken before the next convention. My lord president, to whom you have delivered a coppie of my petition, and hath promised me his favor in the furtherance thereof, when it shall be read in councill. I have many worthie frindes there besides, as Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Sir John Holland, Sir Anthonie Ashley Couper, col. Moreley, col. Thompson, and others, whoe I know will all effectually second it. I therefore request you to present it, and to move, that at least I may be ordered some parte of the money due to me, for my present supply, and that the rest may be charged in the list of debts, which the councill shall think fitt to present to the parliament at their next sitting. Your favorable remembrance of me herein shall ever oblige me.

A letter

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

SIR,

IN answer to yours of the second of April, and of your former, you know very well what ^{A.D. 1660.} is common here, and that it is as well out of compassion to the king, as out of ill ^{Vol. lxvii.} will to those, that made war against us, as also from a desire of novelties, that the king's ^{P. 357.} restoration is much wish'd for; and, which is more, the most of the regents desire it, not only for the above-mentioned reasons, but for the interest of ^{pr. of Orange.} 148. And forasmuch as the English are at enmity with the Spaniards, and that therefore they will be loth to send to Brussels to him, some are of opinion, that the king be invited to come hither. But this is only the thought of some particular men; for the states take no notice of those things, but wait the issue of them on England; Et quo fata vocant, virtus secura sequetur. Nevertheless it is probable, that the ^{friends of princeps pr. of Orange} 145 and the 148 also expect great advantage by the re^{king Charles;} establishment of 138; and that consequently the 173 174 here are not without apprehensions. Notwithstanding all this, ^{pr. of Orange's} 148 business is not yet done; for he is very low and poor. And this business of Orange will render him very contemptible; for paupertas ridiculos homines facit. The more prudent judge, that if the king be not re-established or recalled by the next parliament, he will never. But I am of opinion, that the hopes of the king will never die, so long as discord and contention remain in England.

The great expectation of peace in the North is the cause, why the ^{raising money} equipage here goes on slowly; neither are the final resolutions taken concerning that, which was formerly designed.

In fine, the provinces have not yet fully given their consent; and there is but little money, without which the admiralty can do nothing, and people are weary of contributing so much. Nevertheless provision must be made as well against the Turks and Portugals, as for the transportation of ambassadors; and as soon as there is a settled government in England, they will send thither also.

Since England has shewn its backwardness towards, or some jealousy of ^{Sweden,} 141, it has been ^{Sweden} impossible for ^{k. of Sweden,} 141 to continue the war. But since the death of the late 141, doubtless the jealousies are not so great. The time, when the ambassadors are to set out hence for France, and for Spain, is not yet pitched upon; neither is the day appointed yet for the kings and infanta to meet; for it is certain they will not come before, but after the solemnity, in regard they are not invited to the wedding, but go of themselves to congratulate. Moreover there is to be a treaty in France concerning the last-gelt, and in order to the renewing the amity, which will not signify much; for as long as this state will maintain commerce, and that their neighbours will partake with them, there will be always jealousies, and matter of contention. In Spain it will be nothing but a business of compliment. If it be possible to see any thing of the instruction, I will endeavour it. I am points,

A.D. 1660. points, that have been in controversy between the crowns of Sweden and Denmark, are by generall declarations one both sides admitted, we still find difficultys and delayes in the treaty. The commissioners on both sides did the last week meet three days successively, one after another, without advancing one step towards a conclusion. The method they agreed upon as the most expeditious was, to go through the Roskyld treaty, examine every point, and change that, which should be necessary. The first day was spent by the Danes in a dispute upon the second article, they desiring such a mutation, as might leave them a liberty of continuing and contracting defensive alliances. The Swedes knowing, that under the name of defensive alliances they did intend thoes, that were truly offensive, and that there was a design betwixt the emperour, kings of Poland and Denmark, and elector of Brandenburg, under pretences of mutual defence, to make a league against Sweden, would not consent, that the article should be changed. The mediators, according to their orders, joyned with them: the Danes yeilded. Nevertheless the next day they brought the same point again into dispute, and spent their whole time upon it, without coming to any conclusion. The third day the Danes proposed the changing of their methode of proceeding, offering, that they would give unto the mediators a project containing the conditions, upon which they would make peace. I was ready to accept this, knowing, that they must in that conforme themselves unto the agreement of the Hague; and then the peace could be immediately concluded; or by varying from it, they must be refusants. But the other mediators did rather choose, that equally on both sides they should deliver unto us thoes mutations, which each of them desired should be made in the treaty of Roskyld, in writing, that we might do our office in reconciling the differences between them. The Swedes assented unto that alsoe. This morning was appointed for receaving the papers on both sides. The Swedes are ready; but I hear nothing from the Danes. I cannot but wonder at the confidence of thoes ambassadors, that desire satisfaction for their losses by the delayes of the peace this winter, when nothing is more true, then that they have bin caused by the Danes, at least as much as by the Swedes. And now they do in all things proceed with more frivolous disputes, to evade the conclusion of the peace, then the others; and unless they be forced, will never consent to the conditions proposed, notwithstanding all their declarations and promises. In my opinion the states had no reason to wonder at our protest, unless they thought, that we, having no force here, should in all things receive the lawe from their ministers, as if we served a state, that had not a ship in the world, or that was plunged into such difficultys and disorders, as we could never hope to see it recover out of them. We were of another opinion; and though England hath noe force heare, nor is at present in a condition of sending any, whereby we can defend ourselves against the wrongs we receive, we thought it necessary to leave such a paper, as might justify our proceedings, whensoever it should please God to put us into a condition of demanding right and satisfaction. The truth is, the proceedings of 292 is insupportable; for besides their insolency in 112 109 76 181 330 207 302 217 137 treating with France and England as subjects, Sidney cannot trust what they say. The Fr. embass. and 147 48 86 63 11 142 138, 631 212 443 142 113. 176 141 113 332 207 11 61

 we

66 do sometimes humble them; but they return again to their old course. This obliged us to deliver the paper, which Slingerland did professe was reasonable, and that they could expect no lesse. And when they could not find fault with the matter, they took exceptions at it for being false Latin, which probably is true; for our two secretaries being absent, I writ it, having never in my life written so much as three lines in that language. But I am not sollicitous for that reproach in a man of my profession; the breaking of Pritian's head is noe great crime. Pray do you take care, that the Danes doe not obtain any order, that may retard the peace: perhaps they will not be sorry to be denied. They think they must ask for the satisfaction of their allyes; but I think are willing to be forced to the peace by the Hollanders, that they may visibly deny them any reward for their assistance. And I beleive the cheif reason, that makes the Hollanders unwilling to force them, is the knowledge, that they shall thereby ruin their pretence to be reimbursed for their charges. We shall not be unmindfull of the interest of England in any time, wherein we may advance it; but very little liberty is left unto us more then by obtaining the same priviledges in trade for our nation in the dominions of Sweden and Denmark, as by any treaty is allowed unto the Hollanders. And whatsoever is in the treaty of Elbing, which may be drawne unto prejudice under the name of turbatores pacis, &c. it is not in our power to hinder it; the agreements of the Hague ratified by parliament and our instructions obliging us to endeavour the confirmation of it, together with its elucidations. Extract out of the register of the resolutions of the H. and M. lords states general of the United Netherlands.

Mercurii, 14. April, 1660. [N. S.]

THE lord Huygens, and other their H. and M. lordships commissioners for the Danish affairs, have exhibited and caused to be read in the assembly, a certain project of treaty upon the conclusion and upon delivery of the obligation mentioned therein for the 60000 rixdollars, mentioned in their H. and M. lordships resolution of the eighth and twenty-seventh of March last, and the sixth of this month, which are to be sent by this state to the king of Denmark, and likewise concerning the security, which their H. and M. lordships desire for the reimbursement of the charges, which this state hath been at by assisting of Denmark against the king of Sweden during this late war, over and above the ordinary assistance and succour promised in the alliance made in the year 1649. the said projected agreement being as followeth:

This day, the — of April, 1660. is between us the commissioners of the king of Denmark on the one hand, and the states general of the United Provinces on the other, agreed and concluded, by virtue of our respective powers, that there shall be sent by the state to the said king of Denmark the sum of 150000 gilders, at 5 per cent. and under a promise to pay in the said capital sum at the end of a year; for security of which sum his said majesty is to give bond, and likewise secure the same unto this state out of the revenue of Drontheim. And the said revenue is also to be security for the charges, which this state hath been at in assisting the king of Denmark during his war against the king of Sweden, over and above the assistance promised in the alliance made between the king of Denmark, and their H. and M. lordships.

Whereupon being debated, their H. and M. lordships have approved of the said agreement, and resolved, that the same shall be sent to the lords commissioners extraordinary in Denmark, and to conclude the same with the lords commissioners of the said king.

DEAR SIR,

Calais, 14. April, 1660. [N. S.]

WE have little on this side to acquaint you with: only 'tis said the court of France is moving towards the frontiers to meet the Spanish court, who intend shortly to have their interview, and the marriage to be consummated. Our king, we hear, is lately come to Breda to see his sister the princess royal. Sir, I hope the time approaches likewise for our interview, if all things tend so well there still, as it was expected, and is hoped by us. I presume, till the parliament sit, little of moment will offer.

THE changes on that side have been so many of late, and so suddain, that before we in this corner of the world could have knowledge of the first, a second and third have been brought forth, which has kept us much in the dark as to the knowledge of many things very essentiall to our negotiation. It is but very lately (and that by accident too) that we got notice of the present turn of things on that side; whereby finding yourself a member of the councell, and more particularly deputed to the management of forreigne affairs, I have presumed to recommend unto your favour whatever may concern our business here, or ourselves. In order thereunto we have weekly given an account to the councell of our proceedings, which I presume hath come safe to your hands; and by that, which goeth hearwith, you will see, that in all probability the differences betwixt those two crowns are drawing to a conclusion; wherein I should speak with more confidence, did not their animositys and slow manner of proceeding render things more subject to change. Yet this is such a truth, that the Swedes find it now their interest to make peace; and the Danes cannot make war alone, or without the assistance they have hitherto had from Holland, which now seems to be very weary of giving it any longer. And those ministers do at present so much press a conclusion, that a few days will put it to an issue, which I hope will be that of peace, which will render our further service here useles; and therefore obliges us to desire the favour from you, to procure and send the councell's leave then to returne, which will be no small satisfaction to us, after so long and so much unexpected absence. I shall then be glad to give you a further account of our proceedings, and more particular assurance, that I am,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

I RECEIVED yours by the last post, with all the inclosed, concerning the affairs of the Sound, and have in myne to the councell inclosed a copy of the memoriall, which I have made ready on that subject, and intend to deliver to the states general to-morrow; and in the mean time I have acquainted Mons. Coyet, that I have received orders concerning his affairs. He said, he was very glad; but withall that the lord Nieuport's sonne had reported, that instructions were gone into the Sound to the ministers of England, to make the 400,000 rixdollars a condition sine qua non, as to the peace; and said, that in that England, which pretends so much friendship to Sweden, is still doing to their prejudice; and that whatever Holland hath a mind unto, they cannot persuade them to. But I told him, it was not so, nor any other order, than as formerly to use their endeavours therein; at which he was very glad, and said, that they valued the money, but yet not so much as that England, from whom they expect advantages, should be still putting them on things to their losse. The last post I wrote you my owne mind about this business, and that which is, I am confident, their interest.

When you have drawn up the proclamation concerning pyracies, and that I have a copy, I shall quickly send you my thoughts about it. I dowpt not, but that you do consider that, which was publisht at my instance by this state in November, 1657. And

As for the business of Poland, I weekly send you such letters, as come from the minister of this state there. If the emperor and Brandenburgh cannot finde that peace, it's thought, they will be comprehended in it, and restore what they had taken in Pomerania; yet some talk, as if they have a mind not to restore them, Poland shold make peace; and also to keep what they have taken from the king of Denmark. But that will be hard for them for them to do. France will certainly not suffer the king of Sweden to be beaten out of Pomerania. Of that you may rest assured, in regard of the king of France his interest in Alfatia.

It's

It's said, that this great meeting of the king and his brothers at Bredagh is to meet some, A.D. 1660. that were to come to him from England; and much talk there is, as if a person of quality came lately from England to Rotterdam. It is said, that if the Spaniards do really apprehend his being called to England by the parliament, that they will stoppe him to gett Dunkirke. There came last weeke in one day eight expresses to him from England.

Nicupoort, the Dutch embassador in England, to Ruysch.

MY LORD,

Westm. 16. April, 1660. [N. S.]

I UNDERSTAND in the beginning of the week, that there was a design on foot to Vol. 1xvii. persuade the council to believe, that their H. and M. lordships, closing more narrowly p. 338. with Denmark, had sent new orders thither to assault Sweden again by sea and land with all their power; as also, that their H. and M. lordships had a design to get Drontheim and other places under their power, thereby to cut off the commerce and fishing-trade of the English nation about Iceland and Muscovy. So I thought it my duty to make all such stories and fictions fruitless; and upon the twelfth instant I fully informed the general of all that I had heard, and clearly demonstrated, that their H. and M. lordships had proceeded with all integrity and justice, and had not in the least transgressed against the conventions at the Hague, nor did not pretend to get any place into their possession, to the prejudice of this state. His excellency said, that there were many people, that endeavoured to sow jealousies between both nations; but that he conceived, that the present constitution of affairs, as well of England as of the United Provinces, ought to move them to unite closer to each other. I spoke likewise to his lordship about the piracy committed at sea, and related to him several particulars about it. Upon which he declared to me, that it was highly displeasing to him; and that he would speak with the council of state about it.

The next day some lords came, and had a conference with me, and delivered me a project of a proclamation against the excesses of the pirates and private men of war, desiring to resume the conference as soon as I should be ready to communicate my considerations unto them, declaring, that they were not qualified without special order from the parliament to conclude with me the articles formerly agreed upon with me; but that they conceived the publication of the said proclamation would be of good operation. After I had taken the proclamation, I asked their lordships, if they had made report of what I had proposed in the last conference concerning the pacifying of the two Northern kings. The said lords

A.D. 1660. told me, that the report was made, and such orders given to be sent to the lords plenipotentiaries in Denmark, as will put an end to the long-desired treaty of peace. I then assured their lordships, that the reports spread up and down, that their H. and M. lordships intended to get Drontheim or other places of Denmark into their power, were false and fictitious, and were only invented to raise jealousy; and that some people had often endeavoured to make use of such stories, to the prejudice of their H. and M. lordships; but that truth had still suppressed those lyes. Yesterday in the afternoon I spoke with Sir J. Holland and others, and proposed to them my considerations upon the said projected proclamation. I shewed them, that there was no penalty specified in the said proclamation, being only a general prohibition; and that there should be proceeded in the court of admiralty against the transgressors, according to the rights and laws of this nation. Their lordships said, that they had no legislative power, and therefore could dispose no further concerning it. I declared to their lordships what their H. and M. lordships had done to cause all complaints to cease, which had been made on the side of England; and I delivered unto their lordships copies of such placarts, as had been published by their H. and M. lordships. Their lordships said, they would report the whole to the council of state.

Secretary Thurloc to Mr. Downing, the English ambassador in Holland.

SIR,

Vol. lxvii.
p. 342.

I HAVE received yours of the ninth of April, N. S. and am fully of your minde touching the peace in the Sound, and have been soe longe; but I finde, that all here are not of that opinion, which is the reason, that the instruction touchinge the 400,000 rix-dollars was given to the plenipotentiarys there in the manner, that my last mentioned. The postscript I got put in afterwards, whereby it is wholly left to them upon the place; and I hope they will manage it accordingly. The Dutch ambassador presseth here very much to know, what direction is given touching the 400,000 rix-dollars: but the councill do delay to do it; and it will not be fitt for you to take any notice of it where you are. The last week you had direction from the councill, how to carry yourself in the business of the Sound, which I hope is come to your hands. Since that the councill have given an answer to several papers of the Danes, a copy whereof is herewith sent to you, which will be a further light, how to carry yourself in that business; the scope whereof, as you will see, is to keep the treatys exactly upon the foot of the conventions of the Hague, though possibly to be a little lax therein would be the best wayes to delay the conclusion; but this is the way the councill intends to goe.

Monf. Nieuport acquainted his commissaries yesterday, that the cessation is accepted of; and that the treaty is renewed between Sweden and Denmark; and that a peace will follow forthwith; and that the fleets of Sweden and the Dutch ride together like good friends, whereof I finde noe mention in yours.

I am of your mind, that England shall doe well to appeare with a little warmth in the business of Portugall; and I shall endeavour to obtain from the councill an instruction to you touching that business, to be sent away by the next post. I am

Whitehall, 6. Apr. 1660.

Your very affectionate servant.

As

As to the articles about the pyracies, as the Dutch ambassador calls them, the councell A.D. 1660. chooseth rather to goe by way of a proclamation, and enclyneth to issue this proclamation. I pray let me have your opinion of it, and whether they should not issue one to the like effect.

There are here great thoughts of heart touching the present constitution of affairs. The sectarians with the commonwealth's men look upon themselves as utterly lost, if the king comes in; and therefore probably will leave no stone unturned to prevent it; but what they will be able to do, I see not, of themselves, unless the Presbyterian joynes with them, whereto I see no disposition; yet many of them are alarmed also, and are thinking how to keep him out, and yet not mingle again with the sectaries. Others of the Presbyterians are studying strickt conditions to be put upon the king, especially touching church-government, hoping to bind him that way; and therein are most severe against all the king's old party, proscribing them, which are already beyond sea: not one of them is to returne with him, if he comes in upon their termes; and prohibiting his party here to come near him: he must also confirm all sales whatsoever. The peeres and others of the more moderate party speak of the isle of Wight treaty: but there is another brisk party of the old and new cavaliers, and these are the most numerous, that would have him in the same condition his father would have been in, if he had prevailed in the warre against the parliament. And these being generally armed through your nation, will in all likelihood carry it, if they will push for it; and scarce a day but reviling pamphlets come out against all the parliament did, from top to toe, without making any difference. All are trayters now, all rebels. One doctor Griffith printed and published a little book, justifying the kinge in all his warrs against the parliament; and wherein he called the five members traytors; and the warr the parliament made in the beginning of it, rebellion. And being sent for to the councell, he justified it: whereupon he is committed to the gate-house to be tried according to the nature of his offence.

There was like to have been a great stirr at Gloucester. Massey went down thither to stand for a burgesse. Before the election some of the soldiers by order of the general seized him. Upon this grew a great tumult, the people endeavouring to rescue him. In this scuffle many were wounded on both sides. The soldiers at last taking Massey's paroll, the matter was appeased, and Massey is sent for to appear before the councell.

What elections are made, you will see by the printed diurnall, which I suppose is sent you by another hand.

There is a test signed and signinge in that army, whereby the officers do oblige themselves to submitt to and acquiesce in the determination of the next parliament. St. Omers and Air, by a new treaty, are to be delivered to the French; which is strange.

I heare the king is at Breda. If you could have a person there, or where he is, that might give some constant intelligence immediately, and acquaint me with what persons go and come, I would return to you an hundred or two hundred pounds for the service. I do not see, but that the next parliament will endeavour to settle the nation by the king; but certainly great difficultys will attend it.

Col. Algernon Sidney to Mr. Downing.

HONOURED SIR,

I WROTE this inclosed letter some days since, but had not an opportunity of sending it Vol. lxvii.

since that time. Wee have received a long formall project from the Swede, with a multitude of elucidations of the Roskyld treaty, and other littell things they would endeavour to bring in, but not in any materiall point contrary unto it. The Danes did at the same time give us thare exceptions to our project delivered to them in January last. They do not consist of so many sheets of paper, as the other; but do directly contradict the Roskyld treaty, theare own declarations, and our agreements in all the materiall points, concerning alliances, the cession of provinces to Swede, and the businesse of Holsteine, with some others. We forget not to make use of this, to shewe the sinceritie of theire desires of peace, and how well they deserve the satisfaction expected. Wee have had somme conferences with the commissioners one both sides upon thare severall papers communicated unto each party, what we had received from theire adversarys, and heard what they could say to justify their own pretences; finding that they would dispute and cavill for ever, without concluding any thing. The mediating ministers are to meet to-morrow, and forme a project suitable unto the treaty of Roskyld, the declarations of both kings, and theare owne orders; by which wee hope both partyes will sufferr thare interests to be regulated. HONOURED SIR, Copenhagen, 17. April, 1660.

A.D. 1660.
 Vol. lxvii.
 P. 353.

I TOOK the liberty the last night to accompany the dispatch with a few lines to yourself. Having this morning early received yours of the 23d of the last month, (though the post be in a readiness to be gon) I cannot omit the acknowledgement of the receipt of it, and further acquaint you, that as concerning that clause about the remission of the four hundred thousand, we have so far debated it with the Swedes, that we do not doubt, but they are already resolved to quitt it. All the advantage we have proposed to make of it for them is, that some part of their troupes may remain in quarters here, till grasse be growen, that they may live elsewher. We are immediately going about the forming of the treaty mentioned in our dispatch to the councell, and have our materialls so far prepared, that I hope it may be finished before night, and perfected to be presented to either party within five or six dayes; and to your view by the next occasion. I shall in the interim take the liberty againe to mind you of our desire to returne, when the worke is don; which whenever it shall be, shall beg of God, that we may find the spirits of the distracted people quieted by the happy beginnings and stedfast hopes of the like conclusion of such a settlement, as may be a just foundation of rest and peace to the three nations in all their concernes.

SIR, I am

Your very humble servant,

ROB. HONYWOOD.

General Monck to the bailiffs of Bridgnorth in Shropshire.

GENTLEMEN,

Vol. lxvii.
 P. 355.

THE consideration I have of the great concernement of the nations in the good event of this next parliament, and the desires I have to contribute my endeavours in any thing, that may tend to that end, give me this occasion of writing to you. I know there is nothing can rationally be of more service to this nation at this time, then that persons of known ability and fidelity to publique and rationall interests be chosen for this parliament; upon which account I do assure mysele, the request I shall now make will not be unwellcome to you, in recommending to your choyce John Thurloe esq; to be one of your burgeses, in which, as I do undertake it will be for publique advantage, so I shall particularly owne it as an obligation and respect to,

GENTLEMEN,

Whitehall, 7.
 Apr. 1660.

Your assured friend,

GEORGE MONCK.

Sir William Killegrew to king Charles II.

SIR,

In the possession of Joseph Radcliffe, of the Inner Temple, esq;

I HOPE your majesty will allowe me in their number, who are very glad for your coming into England, and one, that maye as reasonably as many others have hopes, by your favor, to gett some preferment or reparation for my losses, and make that my designe in my perticuler adress unto your majesty on the account of my neere relation to your father, and his favor to me grounded on his assurance, that I preferred his service before my owne interest; which this inclosed letter, all his owne hand writing, doth clearly shewe; which was the occasion for my so frequent walkinge with him at Oxford, of which your majesty was then a daily witness. And, Sir, that I maye now make good my old character, I have no perticuler sute unto your majesty. I wish only to share in the general good of the nation, and doe humbly begge leave to present unto your view and consideration these followinge conceptions, from a heart, that will ever prefer your majesty's prosperety, and the generall good, before my private interest.

First, Sir, your character is presented heere as the most polliticke prince livinge, that understands all the artes of a courte, and as capeable to make these nations happie as any of your prediceffors have done. And from this those now at the helme of government doe raise arguments to dought their owne security; and will therefore bringe your majestie in on termes, such as maye looke like fetters unfitt to be imposed on their kinge, for whom A.D. 1660. they have so high a vallew; and at a tyme, when the nation calls alowde for you, as the only cure for all their evells. But, Sir, 'tis conseaved, that if your majesty doe putt on such golden fetters frankely, they will rather adorne, then clogge your government; and insteed of restraining your free heart, you will have more power in a short tyme to grattefy and reward such as have merited favours from you. Sir, I doe not presume to sett your majesty a rule, but to offer unto your consideration some of the discourses, which the kinge your father did alowe me, in my frequent walkinge with him every morninge at Oxford, when his condition was not so desperate as yours since has bein.

Suppose, Sir, that you were now called in without any restrictions, how impossible a worke it would be, to please all those, that have really served your father and your selfe, with them that will pretend to it. By what I frequently heare is the expectations of many, half the revennue of England will not doe it, did you come in a conqueror. For if your majesty doe but thinke on the numerous clergie, with their famelyes, and on the innumerable multitudes of all those that have suffred on your side, that will expect a reparation or recompence; naye, Sir, it is evident, that all the people in generall doe looke, that you should bringe them peace and plenty, as well as a pardon for all those, who have offended. And I doe feare, you will find it a harder matter to satisfie those, that call themselves your friends, and those who really are so, then all those, who have been against your majesty. Then, Sir, when I consider, how many there are of greate meritt, that you are in honor obledged to consider, who have lost a parte or all their estates, and have ventred far for you; such as maye justly pretend to greate places of trust, of honor, and profit; and also, that some of the grandees heere, who have now done your worke, will expect the like from you; 'tis not your three kingedoms, that will aford halfe enough places or imployments for them all, which will dissatisfie all those, that miss of their hopes, in case your majesty have all at your disposinge. From such thoughts as these I gather, Sir, that however your comminge in on termes may looke at first sight as a lesninge of your dignity, 'twill prove more advantagious to your future happines, then to come in without conditions; for no sober man can repine, if your majesty doe not give what you have not power to give.

Next, Sir, if you come to your crowne as freely as you are borne to it, how will you settle church-government at first, to please the old true Protestants? And how the Presbyterians, who now call you in, when all other interests have failed to doe it? And how the Papists, who doe hope for a tolleration? How satisfie the Independents, the Congregation, and all the severall sortes of violent sectaries? Whereas if your majesty be tyed up by articles, none of all these can blame you for not answringe their expectations.

Then, Sir, for the militia by sea and land, how can your majesty let fall the greevous taxes, which the people groane under, and then defraye that vast expence? for though some perticuler persons doe desire your comminge for love to your selfe, 'tis the generall affliction, that invites the generallety to wishe for your majesty, as the only remedy to remove their opressions. But if the parliament takes the care and charge of the militia, the people can have no argument against what their owne trustees shall doe for the good and safety of the nation; and whatever the nation does well, will be honor to the kinge; and whatever miscarries, he will avoyd the blame this waye.

Then, Sir, suppose you alowe the parliament to preferr halfe your councillors to you, and halfe your greate officers of state, they must be your servants, and confirmed by your greate seale, and atend on your person, and no doubt will seeke your favor. And then, if any doe not discharge their trusts, they must answer it to those, that preferred them to you; by which meanes your majesty will be well served in emulation by both partyes, and be free from the old custome of your prediceffors, to have all your officers faults layed to your charge; which lost our kinges their peoples hearts more then all other things. So that 'tis humbly conseaved, if your majesty doe parte with some of these ornaments of your crowne for a while, your majesty maye be now much happier, then in these distracted tymes to have all fully in your owne power, accompanied with the evells, that will necessarily atend them for some yeares, till this giddy humore of the people be allayed by there experience in your majesty's happie reigne.

'Tis also humbly conseaved, if your majesty have a large yearly revennue settled for your owne and famelye's support, 'twill be of greater use to your selfe and servants, than two millions a yeare to defraye the land sea militia with. By your owne private revennue your majesty will have enough to reward who you please, without controule, and maye in a fewe yeares laye up a treasure to your owne use; that insteed of borrowing from your subjects, you maye at any time be able to lend your parliament a grand summe, if occasion require, and be reimbursed againe with love and thankses from the whole nation; and so become the father of your people, and lord of all their hearts; and thus invite them to compliment you into all your rights and royalties in fewe yeares; for when they see their kinge is become their best friend, who can they trust before him? A little honest arte,

A.D. 1660. Sir, this waye, would bringe you to more greatenefs and power, then any of your predecessors ever had; for the Englishe is to be wonne by kindness.

I am bould, Sir, to shewe unto your majesty these heads, (which I heare will be offered unto you) for argumentation with your owne heart, only because many tymes the conceptions of weake men have inlightned the judgements of wise princes. This is not fitt to be debated at your councell; yet, Sir, this discorse I have often entertained the kinge your father with in the garden at Oxford, when every body wondred what he could find to talke so much alone with me about. I looke not on myselfe, Sir, as a fitt counsellor of state, nor have I any pretention to any preferment or rewarde: I doe knowe, this discorse has nether eloquence nor arte to sett it out; but is really from a true heart, that loves you; 'tis my mite, Sir, havinge noe other waye then my prayers and wishes to serve you in. I shall rejoyce to see you happie; and if I thought any body else would offer these things unto your consideration, I would not have troubled your majesty with these rude lines. But havinge some reasons to apprehend, that some from hence maye give your majestie arguments not to accept of the conditions, that will be offred you, on hopes that France and Spaine will bringe you in on better termes, which I shall ever dought of their good-wills to doe; or if they would, it is not very likely they can, because a forraine warre may unite these nations (now full of solldiers) to their utmost opposition, which is the only hope of the sectaries, which maye begett a hazarrdous newe warre. Whereas by comming in by consent and on articles, you will be welcome, and be secured by generall Monke and his army against all opposers, if any shall apeere; for who can meritt more your trust, then he, who under God has done this great worke for you, beyond the indeavours or the hopes of all your friends, and who has refused the supreme power proffred and pressed upon himselfe?

Lastly, Sir, I do humbly conseave, that your majesty may with honor and safety throwe yourselfe freely into the armes of your people, and rely on such conditions, as they will thinke fitt for their kinge in honor to accept of, who is fully resolved to raise his owne happines on his subjects love; which I beleeve your father's reign will shewe. Such a trust in them must in a short tyme begett their trust in you; and maye make them impose less at present: however, in my poor opinion, such a generall free offer is more then can be desired, and will be more honorable then by submitting to perticulers.

Now, Sir, if all this, that I have proposed, be what you knewe before, 'tis more then I am acquainted with. My excuse is my affection to your majesty, without any designe for myselfe. There be so many, that have merited your favors, beyond any pretence of myne, that my only sute is, that your majestie will be pleased to pardon this presumption to give my opinion in this greate affare, which I doe not thinke fitt to have the approbation of any man in; but however my good-will be accepted, I shall ever live and dye,

Horsely, Sir,
Apr. 8. 1660.

YOUR MAJESTIE'S

Sir, I do humbly begge the returne of the kinge your father's letter, which I keep as a testimony of his favour to me.

most affectionate, humble, and obedient subject and servant,

W. KILLIGREW.

Resolution of the states general.

April 20. 1660. [N. S.]

Vol. lxvii.
P. 359.

THERE hath been reported in the assembly, that the heer Huygens, and other deputies of their H. M. had examined the proposition of the deputies of Zeland; to wit, that during the employment of the fleet in Denmark, not one command had been given to any captain of Zeland, but always to an Hollander, though he were younger than the other; which might cause disorders, by reason that it is contrary to the custom of the militia of this state; and that one province cannot pretend any superiority over the members of the union; as also that the states of Zeland declare, that they will not suffer it any longer. They have also complained, that vice-admiral de Ruyter being desired by some Zeland captains to give them victuals, absolutely refused the same; saying, that he had orders to give them none, altho' he had abundance thereof; which their superiors do take for a sign of ill-will, which ought not to be between the members of the union; and having also conferred thereupon, the deputies of the provinces of Guelderland, Utrecht, Friseland (those of Overysfel being absent) and Groningen, have said nothing touching the 1st point, that letters shall be written to all the colleges of the admiralty, that the intention intention of their H. M. is, that the elder captain shall have the command of a Squadron ^{A.D. 1660.} or of more than one ship of war; and that he shall command without distinction of the colleges of the admiralty, from whence he comes: and that the states of Holland shall be desired to yield hereunto. As for the second point, before any thing be resolved, the advice of the admiralties of Holland shall be expected.

confident of 781 91, sent to intreat 644 to give order, that he might have a place in the church of Nostre Dame, to heare some concert of oure musicke, which was there yesterday; and they two were so placed, as they might conveniently entertaine one another, as they did for a long time before the musicke begann. The affaires of England, which are now the whole subject of mens discourse, was willingly entred upon by 644;

 lord Aubony,
 and

A D. 1660. and after they had agreed in the judgment both of them made upon the favorableness of the present conjuncture; 925 tould him, there were newes arriv'd that morning by an expresse, which were imparted to few; and that he would not trouble 644 with repeating them, before 593 had acquainted them with them. But 644 replying, that perhaps he might not see him in three or four dayes, he then told him, that for certaine the counsell of state in England had resolv'd to call in the king eaven upon very easy tearms, and that before the parlement sate: that the counsellors now about him, among whom he asked, whether there was not one they cal'd 837, might perhaps be excepted against, and left behind; to which 644 answered, that doubtless 837, if his present going might bring the least prejudice upon the king, would willingly condescend to stay, knowing the king as well as he does; for whether he goes or stayes, his majesty, who beleaves him faithfull and useful to him, is more constant, then to change his affection upon such circumstances; and that being preserved, none knew better then 925, that saw the cardinall expel'd and brought in againe to rise higher, how many ways there lye open at court to compass what the princ hath a mind to. 925 tould him besids, that he had spoken freely to 452 529, and let 229 know, that 270 ought not to thinke of going suddenly into 662; and that those, who would advice 229 to it, or intertaine 229 with such hopes, were not 229 freinds; that length of time would be requisit for settling matters there. 644 thinks this to be an arrow shott out of 593 91 bow, and a warning-peece given to prepare 363 528 for that, which perhaps he may consider to be for his own advantage; it being certaine, that if 454 (which perhaps 140 fears) exclude himself, 140 cannot but be desirous, that 229 603 should stay, by whom he 330 91, and for whom 140 is 175 91 167 21 184 24. 925 added likewise, that 363 594 ought to leave behind 547 454 348 127, and satisfy 540 322 all such 719 91; and 363 833 was of that opinion. The court goes by the way of Parpinian with a few select persons only to the place of conference, there to solemnise the marriadge.
The B. of Drommore tells me, that cardinall Grimaldy is againe cal'd to court, and to be imploy'd to Rome, to mediat the surrender of Avignon, mortgaged, we say, for a sum of money, whereof the one half is to be payd in hand, and the other, (if wee be possest of the place) God knowes when. The situation of it pleases the king; and men say, that it will render the face of France more intire on that side. There remaines, that I tell yow, how I blest and admire the providenc of God, in the great work you have in hand; and seems to be so disposed, as it is morally certaine it cannot fayle of a happy conclusion; for I am much deceived, if wee shall not see this, that is the less faulty party, and now has the power, prosecute those, who have imbrued their hands in that crime of blood with more violenc then another; and all of them lay their hands on the sacrifice, as the best mean to expiat their offences, and recover their innocence; so as those most interesteed need but looke on and contemplat, how God hath reach'd forth the hand of his mercy and justice both at a time; his mercy, in restoring our king; his justice, in exposing to the odium of the people those few heads, that contrived the murder of his father; and what blessings he hath kept in store for England, that after such civill discentions, and such various and ridiculous changes of government, hath rescued it from being the sinke, into which all the excrements of neighbor nations, now after a tedious warr preparing to make cleane their owne dwellings, were in all likelyhood reddey to fall. Thus humbly taking leave, I remayne at Brest what shipping the king of France hath there, are fitting for the sea, which are in number about seven. This person hath and is willing att any time to go over into Flanders or France upon that affair. I humbly intreate to knowe, whether you have occasion, and will have him still to continue to gett what intelligence he can, and to be

Highly HONOURABLE and truly HONOURED SIR,

Vol. lxvii.

NEVER was stone more impetuously hurried downward by the inward pressure of its own natural weight, and the foreign impressed force of the strongest hand, than the seven-fold greater part of Bridgnorth are by the native bent of their own inclination, and overpowerfull sway of their great landlords, meeting together, irresistibly carryed on to an high cavalier choyce of both their burgessees. None could indeed certainly tell, what execution the enclosed engine might do, till it had been fully tryed; but the minister of the place, (a very discreet man) together with mysele, and a little colledge of our most select friends, setting ourselves critically, as wee were able, to feel the pulse, and curiously to inquire into the temper of the town, doe, upon the best prudential observation we could make, jointly conclude, that the generall's writing would be so far from speeding your election, that his standing would not have carryed his own at Bridgnorth, except he would have declared himself absolutely for the king, and without any such terms, as they hear are about to be offered him. Such a spirit is there set up, and so active in Bridgnoth, and even this whole county, that I am verily afraid there will scarcely bee on either knight or burgesse chosen amongst us, that is not a very high royalist. Being therefore tender either of prostituting the general's letter to a baffle, or your name (ever precious and honourable with mee) to a contempt, you have the letter returned, with much trouble and grief of heart, from,

Highly HONOURABLE and HONOURED SIR,

your most faithfull humble servant,

THO. GILBERT.

You are much more honourable and good, than to need my apology for the trouble I have given you, when you know, it was in my heart to have spared neither pains nor charge, (in a place, where I formerly had so good an interest, as to prevail for burgesses unworthy to be named the same day with Mr. secretary Thurloe) that I might have given the nation the hopefull advantage of your sitting in that parliament, which is so dreadfull to the sober, godly people in the nation; and so much the more to me, as having been the only active minister, as you know, in these parts (though never, as I know of, rashly and imprudently, in the old and young protector's tymes); nay, tho' I never carryed incivilly in the least toward the cavalier party, my best and surest friends tell me, I am so much threatened by them, that I cannot (as they apprehend) be long safe among them; so that I shall humbly offer myself to wait as chaplain upon an ambassador (for I hear the councell is about to send divers). If you think me worthy of such an employment, I have upon that consideration enclosed the last peece of Latin, that hath come from my pen at a late visitation of a new free-schoole in our neighbourhood; whereby you will bee somewhat the better able to judge, whether, amongst other things, my poor stocke of Latine may suffice for such a service.

Mr. Longland, agent at Leghorn, to secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

In the possession of the right hon. Philip Lord Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain.

I WRIT you a fortnight since, in answer to a letter received from you, being very glad of your return to act for the publick, your honour being by long experience so well acquainted with those affaires. Concerning a good correspondent at the place you desire, I doubt not but to effect it to content, when I shall have your resolution, what you intend to spend therein, which must be obtained only by money; for those people cannot be gained but by the force of money, being profest enemies unto us; but for money they will do any thing; adventure both body and soul too. I shall now wait for your direction, what sum to spend, which I humbly conceive must be proportionable to the information you aim at; so yourself must be the only decider of this doubt. I know you look not after common newes, such as the currant or diurnal affaires; but to that, wherein the welfare of state consists: such intelligence must be procur'd from principal men in that court, a monsignor, or secretary at least, if not a cardinal; so that you must not be sparing in the pension, lest the harvest prove accordingly. I cannot approach or address myself to any man to do this office, but with the money in my hand, and ask him this question, whether he will earn so much money yearly for writing a letter once a week. Besides, to avoid jealousy, which the Italians are all infected with, I must not speak or correspond with this man myself, but by another hand, which likewise will cost money; wherewith I acquaint your honour, that you may see and know the depth of the charge for your government. If you will have me go through to settle this intelligence, be pleased to send me the heads of what you desire to know, for my direction; as also the money I shall give, or the yearly pension, which must be paid beforehand, and must be a sum proportionable to the quality of the person, and the intelligence you desire. If you should ask my opinion, what sum were fitting to give, I should answer, a thousand pounds per ann. were well spent, to have such intelligence, as I suppose you aim at; and when least, 500 l. a year pension, and now-and-then 100 l. gratuity, according as the intelligence shall please you. These are really my thoughts; which I humbly refer to your honour's more mature consideration.

Upon the death of the king of Sweden, the queen is hastening from Rome to her own country; but it is believed, she will very hardly find entrance there. At Rome she is very poor and retired, and 'tis believed, want of means to be a chief cause of her departure; for the pope is weary of her. All Italians are strait-handed; they love not such converts, as want money.

This next month the duke of Parma is to marry the duke of Savoy's daughter, and in September next the great duke's son is to marry the duke of Orleans daughter, for which solemnity they already begin to make preparation here.

This week has come no letters from England, which gives much occasion of discourse to the subtle Italians, who absolutely believe, that general Monk is for the king, having, as they say, brought in the secluded members, who have settled the militia in the hands of the king's friends. In Paris the somtymes queen of England gives it out for certain, that her son is suddenly to return, having had promise from them, that are able to perform. In Holland they lay wagers, six to one, of the king's return; and from Brussels, secretary Nicholis writes, with confidence, as much. God direct the parliament's hands to do that, which is for the nation's entire good and welfare! I must not omit to let your honour know a passage, that happened yesterday, in discourse with a couple of Italians concerning the affaires of England, who were very knowing men, as most of them are; but because this discourse may be more than this paper may contain, I shall give it you in a paper apart.

About a month since the state's four frigates, under command of captain Poole, were met off Sapiientia, going for Smyrna to victual. Nothing else offers, but that I am,

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

Your faithfull servant,

CHARLES LONGLAND.

Inclosed

Inclosed in the preceding.

SIR,

23. April, 1660. [N. S.]

I MUST not omit to let you know, what discourse happened yesterday with a couple of Itallians, concerning the affaires of England, who wer very knowing men, as that nation generally is. The opinion of the one was, that the approaching parliament would assuredly call in the king, seing the secluded members had prepared a way for it, by turning out the commonwealth's-men from commanding the militia, and being sheriffs of the countyes, and putting into theyr places the king's friends and cavalliers; instancing the citty of London, who of itself had an army able to bring in the king, and Sir George Booth, who has now the parliament's authority for that, for which he was so latly apprehended. The other answered, althoh this be true, yet it cannot be imagined, that so grav and wys a body as the parliament will soon forget the late great expence of blood and treasure, as again to set up the said government, that caused it; which would be an action of such levity, not to say folly, that so wys a body could not possibly be guilty of. When the Athenians, Tuscans, and Romans, cast off kingly government, they never willingly reassumed it; and yet it never cost al thos nations together half the blood it has England. He further said to the other Itallian, You and I hav wyves and children. How soon it may pleas God to send siknes and death, we know not. Would it be discretion in us to leav our children and estates in the tuition of one of the princes, (the great duk's brothers) or in the hands of a marchant of our own rank and quallity, who may be accountable for his administration? Ovum non ovo similis; and that great and wys body, the parliament of England, not only deliver up theyr own, but the estates, wyves, children, religion, and libertyes too, of three great nations into the hands and custody of one man incontrollable; and not rather put thes pretious jewels into the hands and keeping of twenty or thirty of theyr own members, of whom they may frely demand an account at al tymes. This certainly is consistent with right reason, and the true interest of that nation. To say, that they will bynd the king to such conditions, as no opportunity shall be left him; al such must needs vanish with tyme, and piple's libertyes must again becom inthral'd, whereof the world is full of witnesss and examples.

In the possession of the right honourable Philip lord Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain.

Sir Edward Hyde to Sir John Grenville.

SIR,

April the 23d, Breda, 1660. [S. N.]

THE king hath received yours of the 18th from Ostend, and you will easily beleave he wished you a quick and a safe passage, and is impatient to heare from you, after you have spoken with the gentleman. Since we came to Breda, every day hath brought us more expresses than you imagine from England, and, truly, some from considerable persons of all parties; and all pretend to have great power and credit with the gentleman, and great hope of disposing him to serve the king, in order to which many propositions are made; and from some, the very advises, which are already followed, you will easily thinck the king retournes thancks to all; and desires them to use all their power to so good an end. Now, as the king resolves to conceale nothing of moment from the gentleman, upon whose affection he relies intirely, and that whatsoever he shall be informed of by his majesty, shall not be turned to the prejudice of any man, soe I am directed to let you know of one particular embassaye he hath received, which puts him into some wonder, and the gentleman will better know, what use to make of it, than the king doth. Here is a gentleman comme from my lady Carlile, who went first to the queene at Paris, and from thence hither, with instructions in writing, which the lady professeth are the gentleman's positive advise, derived to her by the secretary Tompson, who is the sole confident betweene them. They conteyne the gentleman's positive exceptions against the king's being in Flanders, or in Holland, as unfit places for them to treat in; the first, as an enemye's and a catholique country; the other, as too much interested in trade; and so like to take advantage of the king's presence; and thereupon his advise is pretended to be as positive, that his majesty should immediatly goe into France, as a place without all exception, as if it were Geneva, for religion, and a country not at all affected to its interest. You will imagine the king beleaves this not to be the gentleman's opinion; yet he thincks it necessary he should know it, that he may the better judge what designe there may be in this, and whither in truth Mr. Tompson be like to have any hand in it. There is another thing, in which the king doth as much desire the gentleman's advise. We have, since I saw you, received very francke overtures from secretary Thurlo, with many great professions of resolving to serve the king; and not only in his owne endeavours, but by the service

This comes through the hands of a person, who will not deceive us, nor is easily to be deceived himself, except by such bold dissimulation of the other, which cannot at first be discovered. Yet it is enough suspected by the king; there is somewhat of curiosity accompanys Thurloe's professions; for he is very inquisitive to knowe, whether the king hath any confidence in the gentleman, or hath approached him the right way; which he desires to know only, that he may finish what is left undone, or be able the better to advise his majesty what he is to do therein.

The king returned such answers as are fitt, and desires to see some effects of his good affection, and then he will find his service more acceptable. Both these particulars the king thinks fit the gentleman should know, that his majesty may receive his advice, and to know what his opinion is of Thurlo, and whither he be able, if he were willing, to contribute much to his majesty's service: but this being of such a nature, as, being communicated, may be turned to the prejudice of persons, to whom his majesty wisheth no hurt, and may draw reproach upon himself and his counsells, the king would not have you impart either of them to any person whatsoever, except the gentleman himself, and Mr. Morice; because, possibly, you may not so conveniently at present be admitted to the gentleman; and then no inconvenience can arise from it. I am,

SIR,

Your most affectionate, and humble servant.

A letter from Paris.

Vol. Ixvii.
p. 367.

BY my former I mention'd what had passed in the cessation of the new charges upon the merchandizes of strangers, that are imported, as cloth, and other things; so that this trouble mean while is over. But the crown upon every tun of all ships, that lade, is still exacted; and also of those ships, that do not lade, and that according to the amplification of this edict touching the tax. After the departure of the last Holland fleet from Nants, came into that river 2 men of war, to cause the tax of a crown upon the tun to be paid, by reason that those of that country would not believe, that that tax should be in the sea-towns. It is believed, that the court will not come hither till August; and for the voyage towards the frontiers, there is on both sides little preparation at present.

Four thousand foot, and two thousand horse, will be shipp'd at Toulon upon the king's fleet, and upon the merchants ships, there stayed. The orders for the employment of those forces are not to be opened, nor read, till they are all at sea. Monsieur Bartet hath brought from Madrid divers letters for the cardinal Mazarin; and saith, that the infanta is the most sweet princess in the world; and that she hath a most admirable wit.

H. and M. LORDS,

Copenhagen, $\frac{16}{26}$. April, 1660.

In the possession of the right hon. Philip lord Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain.

MY lords, The letter which your H. and M. L. were pleased to write to us, of the 19th of this month, is come safe to hand. We thought it our duty to return an answer to the contents thereof with all speed; and, namely, that at this present hour the Swedish fleet of war (except two, that are sail'd to Elsenore, and two more, that are in the bay of Wisnar) doth still lie in and before the harbour of Lantscroone; and none of their fleet never advanced further seaward than near to the fleet of your H. and M. L. which lay at an anchor between Lantscroone aforesaid and this city. And this is also really true, that the Swedish ships of war never took but two Danish vessels, that came running in amongst them, and which might have afterwards escaped, if they had pleased; so that the information, which hath been sent your lordships, hath been falsely grounded, and is an abusive and an erroneous information; and we can with reason, and of our knowledge, assure your lordships, that not the least damage hath been done to the ships of the king of Denmark, and of the subjects of the same kingdom, in sight of the fleet and ships of war of your H. and M. L.; much less, that the hostile actions of Sweden against Denmark mark would have been suffer'd or permitted by the said fleet; having always made it our A.D. 1660. business to prevent the same. And we are rather of an opinion, that since the fleet of your H. and M. L. withdrew from before Lantscroone, there hath been far more damage done to the Swede by the Dane at Sea, than the Dane hath sustained. We shall not fail, in continuation of our duty, punctually to regulate ourselves according to the contents of the said your H. and M. L. letter, and use such prudence in the conduct and management of our negotiation, as we have hitherto used; and we hope your H. and M. L. will have a favourable opinion of our good endeavours against all abusive and sinister impressions, which some may endeavour to make.

A letter of intelligence to secretary Thurloc.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

I HAD by the last post your honour's order and command for to continue to write the Vol. lxvii. intelligence to him, intimated to me from Mr. Isaac Johnson in his letter; and withall, P. 351. your honour's promise to take care for to see me satisfied for my paines, to which I give full beleeif and credit, being your honour's pleasure and command to Mr. Johnson to signifye unto me your honour's order, which I shall strictly observe. And I will not faile to write weekly the intelligence to your honour, and the insides of affaires, as possibell as may be. As for newes, by letters from Danzig, of the 20. currant St. N. we have, that the peace betwixt the Pole and the Swede is concluded: the articells of it are not yet divulged, but as yet kept private, till some small appertenances, belonging to the perfection of the treatie, be debated. The French envoye, Monsieur Colbert, is gone from Wien to the treatie in Prussia, at the Olive, for to intimate to the Swedish commissioners there, that the emperour offers to the Swedes a cessation of armes for 6 weekes, to which the Swedes will not condescend, seing it is done out of meere pollicy for to recreut the forces in Pomerania, especially their cavallery, which the great part of them want good horses, and are much weaker then they were before. Their intent is nothing elce, but to gaine time. The Swede will in a short time be ready to march for to encounter the ennemy in Pomerania. As for the treatie in Dennemark, it sticks on the Danish side, which insift still to have satisfaction from the Swedes, for the losses and dommages since the first of September, when the Swedes did refuse to accept the project of peace made at the Hague; and for satisfaction, they demande from the Swedes to have Bahus in Norway. Besides, this they demand from the Swedes a satisfaction for the losses and dommages since the last breach of the Roscheld's peace, and desire to have from the Swedes, Landtscreon, Malmore, and Christianstadt; but the Swedes will never consent to such impertinent demands. He remaines still to adhere to the project made at the Hague; and if the king of Denmark does not submit to reason, he will be forced to it. But if the Hollander had not played the wagg, and had not pretended this and that, the peace had been concluded much sooner then now. The English expresse coming from England, being sent to the English embassaders in the Sound, is past, and gone further in his journey. The treatie at Izehoe in Hollstein, betwixt the Dane and the duke of Hollstein, is not ended; yet the successe of it is feared to be fruitlesse. The Danish forces continue still the siege before Tonningen. This is all at present from

I MADE bold to draw up a bill of exchange, for to be payed of your honour to Mr. Vol. lxvii. Richard Basse, the sum of fiftene pound sterling, the value received here from Mr. P. 352. David Hecheester, per addresse. I hope your honour will not refuse to pay the sayd summe, for I have been necessitated for to take up so much moneys for to sublist here; and formerly I have been at the charge of or postidge of letters to your honour in time past, which comes to 5 pound sterling, and the 10l. sterling are layd out for dyet. I humbly intreath your honour to accept my bill of exchange, and to order it to be payed. I do engage myselfe (upon the intimation made to me by Mr. Isaac Johnson) herewith to your honour,

In the possession of the Great Britain.

I MET in Thoulouse with two letters of his excellency my lord embassador Lockhart, desiring mee to writt the occurrences of this court unto your honour, which I did beginne there to doe the $\frac{23}{13}$. of this instant.

What I have new to saye, is the arrival of the king and cardinal together neere Dax, intending to come on sunday next to Bayonne. Yesterday an expres of Spaine brought newes of the marying of the infantado with D. Louis de Haro for the king of France at Burgos, from whence that court was to come to Fontaravie within the 5th or the 6th May, St. nov.

They saye the mariadge will bee complished soone after, and the king shall come back immediately with his court at Bourdeaux, except his eminency, who is to stay at St. Jean de Lus, to work with D. Louis de Haro about some busines; which seemes, concerneth rather the strangers then the French.

Maye bee the Spaniards will try to ingage him against the English; but I doe beleve, if once their majestys can carry the infantado out of their hands, his eminency will found pretences enough to excuse himselfe; specially, if the parliament cause the commonwealth to bee united, and soe much considerable upon the sea, that little hopes bee left of a good succeze against that nation, who seemes att last to bee in a condition to proceede forward in the glorious and hapy work of a true stablishment, after so much blood spendeth in itt. The mareschal of Turenne is with the court. I hope your honor will doe me the favor as to excuse my bad languidge, and give mee the permission to remayne still

Mr. Downing's memorial to the states general.

Vol. lxvii.
p. 233.

THE underwritten envoy extraordinary of England hath lately received the resolutions of their lordships the states general, together with certain papers of the admiralty of Amsterdam, concerning a parcel of rye belonging to one Thomas Bawtre, of London, merchant. And, however the said admiralty are pleased therein to pass as hard a censure upon his memorial, touching that matter, as they have against the corn itself, viz. that that it was founded upon misinformation, or not right apprehending thereof; yet, having seriously perused and considered the same, he cannot find, but that the matter of fact, as it is therein set down, is intirely in substance the same with what is set down in the said papers to be matter of fact; to wit, that a certain parcel of rye, belonging to one Bawtrey, merchant of London, was first taken by the Danes, and after by the Swedes, and at last by some ships of war of this state, and sent back to Amsterdam. Nor doth he find any difference in point of circumstance, save only, that whereas in the said memorial it is said, that the Swedes intended to carry the said rye into some place in Pomerania; in the same papers it is alleged, that their intention was to carry it to some place in the Nering, the which, as it is very little distant from Pomerania, so it is not at all material, whether the intention was to carry it to the one or the other.

And for what is said, that the plenipotentiaries of England, in their letter, do only make mention of the rye, and not the ship; but that he, the said envoy extraordinary, in his memorial, doth declare the ship to be an English ship, and so would thereby insinuate, that the less belief is to be given to what is therein demanded; it seems, that however the sentence passed against his memorial is very severe, yet that it hath not proceeded from any over through examination, in reading thereof; the said envoy, in his said memorial, expressly calling the said ship a ship of Lubeck, and demanding nothing but the lading.

And for the reasons, by which the said admiralty would justify the sentence, which they have given, they are such, as, had it not pleased their lordships the states general to have taken the pains to have sent them unto him, he should not have thought them worth the answering; nor yet, that it had been possible for a court of admiralty to have taken away from an honest merchant his goods upon grounds of that nature.

Is it a good argument to say, that the said corn was good prize to the Dane, because it came from a place of Sweden? And what can the consequence thereof be, but an intire making it unlawful for England to trade with any part of Sweden? And may not, upon the same account, all the ships of this country, which come from Spain, be seized by the English, and be good prize unto them?

Or is it a good argument to say, that neither the Danes nor the Swedes did look upon the said corn as belonging to the English; and therefore, that neither ought they also to do it?

Is it a good argument to say, that because justice hath not been done by one, therefore it shall not be done by another? And yet neither doth it appear, that justice was by either of them denied.

As for the passage in the letter of count Magnus de la Garde, in which he calls the ship, in which the said lading was, a prize; doth that any more make it to be a prize, than the letter of lieutenant-admiral Opdam to the said admiralty, wherein he also calls it a prize? And is it not ordinary (pro formâ) to call any ship, that is taken, a prize? Doth it appear, that the said ship was judicially tried before any court of admiralty in Sweden or Denmark, whereby really to make it a lawful prize, and alter the property thereof; or that the ship or lading were so much as demanded by any, that had interest therein? She was taken by the Danes ^{28. June,} _{8. July,} 1659, and continued some time in their hands, and afterwards taken by the Swedes, and by them carried from place to place, and ^{3.} _{13.} August following taken by the ships of this state. And what possibility in so short a time (and in which the said ship was so oft shifted from hand to hand, and from place to place) for the proprietors to be able so much as to know, to whom or which way to address themselves, much less for the perfecting of a process? It was from the 13th to the 30th of August, ere any one came to lord vice-admiral Opdam, so much as to demand either ship or goods, altho' he lay so near to Lubeck.

And for what is in one of the letters of the said admiralty, that they are astonished at one passage in his memorial, to wit, that Thomas Bawtrey, proprietor of the said corn, had already spent above 2000 gilders in the prosecution of this business; they may consider, whether it be possible for a merchant to make a voyage from London to the Sound, (thinking there to have found his ship) and from thence hither, and to stay here so many months, and be at the charge of advocates, and the like, for less; and that he must not have been a very good husband to have spent no more.

And for what is said, that in case he find himself aggrieved, he may have recourse to a revision; it is true, that where there is new matter to be alleged, it may not be improper to have recourse to that way; but here is, in this case, nothing of new matter to be pleaded. And therefore the admiralty justifying the sentence they have already given, what hopes, but after a long expence of time and money, they will give another of the like nature? And besides the injury being done, not by any private person, but by a ship of war in the service of this state, and sent hither by their admiral, it is but reasonable the state should do justice herein, as was this winter done in England, in the like case, upon a ship of this country, seized by an English man of war.

A.D. 1660. The said envoy extraordinary doth therefore demand, that seeing it is not all denied, that the said corn doth veritably belong to the said Bawtrej, merchant of London, and was never out of his possession, nor ever in the hands of any enemy, by which the property would be changed; that it will please their lordships forthwith to command the said rye to be restored unto him, without farther delay and expences.

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Samedy, le 24. d'Avril, 1660. [N. S.]

L'Admirauté d'Amsterdam a escrit une serieuse complainte de ce, qu'on ne leur fournit point d'argent; & que pourtant ils seront obligés de rapeller la flotte de Ruyter; qui bientost sera au bout de ses victuailles. Ceux de Geldre & d'autres ont mis sur le tapis l'affaire de Munster, desirant savoir, en quels termes cela est. Le sieur raet-pensionnaire a promis d'en faire ouverture.

Les ambassadeurs destinés vers Espagne se preparent maintenant tout de bon & pour avoir un secretaire, qui s'entende un peu bien sur les affaires. Ils parlent de requerir tel Pester pensionnaire à Maestricht.

Le sieur Cojet a fait plainte, que Ruyter a prins un navire Suedois, depuis que l'armistice est fait entre cest estat & la Suede.

L'on

A.D. 1660. L'on delibere encore pour donner une response sur le memoire de Downing, & du depuis il a donné un autre memoire.

Lundy, le 26. dito.

L'on a eu une conference sur les affaires d'Outre-Meuse, & demain s'en tiendra un autre; l'on en aura discoursu, si le sieur ambassadeur d'Espagne a de l'inclination pour en faire un fin; que dans 3 à 4 jours on en viendroit bien à bout, voulant dire, que l'intention de son excellence seroit de conserver des certains cavaliers, certains ecclesiastiques, & le passage ou communication de navaigne vers Roleduc, &c.

L'on aura aussy eu sur le tapis les ingredients de l'instruction pour l'ambassade d'Espagne, qui ne contient rien de nouvelle alliance; ains principalement une confirmation de la paix, &c.

Mardy, le 27. dito.

C'est aujourd'huy seulement, que l'ambassadeur de France a fait presenter son memoire: que Vlacq avoit desja imprimé le 25. si que son excellence a au grand peur, que le memoire ne tombast en naufrage, feu, ou autre interruption. L'affaire de Munster, & composition de cela, a esté rememorié par ceux de Gueldre & de Frise; mais le sieur raet-pensionnaire a esté absent.

Les deputés en Dennemarc eserivent, que dans peu ils esperent de parachever le traité au contentement de cest estat; mais autres particularités ils n'en donnent.

Sous mains l'on parle d'envoyer une deputation d'icy au roy d'Angleterre pour le complimenter; mais on attend advis de Breda, si on le trouve asses tempestif & à propos.

Mecredy, le 28. dito.

Le sieur president a derechef mis sur le tapis les affaires d'Outre-Meuse, & devoit les achever; si que demain derechef on les entreprendra.

La Hollande a proposé qu'à present, & en ces deux ambassades, on devoit garder l'honneur; que pourtant on devoit doubler le reiglement, au moins pour cette fois.

La plus-part est bien enclin à cela; mais la Frise & Groningen veulent, que ce soit donc general, & qu'à l'avenir cela se pratique aussy bien qu'à present; & à cela la Hollande ne veut pas entendre.

Jeudy, le 29. dito.

Le sieur Downing aura derechef fait plainte par un memoire escrit, de ce que l'admirauté d'Amsterdam ne fait pas droit touchant la prinse de certain seigle mal jugé & confisqué; mais c'est fulgur e pelvi, tant que les Anglois eux-memes entr'eux sont si mal unys, & ne meritent pas la consideration, qu'ils on fait cy-devant.

Il y a eu plainte de ceux, qui ont credité de l'argent pour le bastiment de temple au Sas, aux quels on ne paye ny capital ny interest.

Tel Bailly aussy emprisonné & deporté par le conseil de Flandre à Middlebourgh fait sa plainte, sur quoy on escrit au dit conseil.

Vendredy, le 30. dito.

Il n'y a rien eu qu'une plainte de Maestricht, qu'on y fait quelque turbe touchant la possession ou jouissance d'icelle, requerant la maintenue. Ce qui est mis en mains des commissaires deciseurs.

Estant meu l'affaire des ambassades vers la France & l'Espagne, a esté dit d'aucuns asses froidement, que cela estoit encore chose éloignée.

Derechef est mis sur le tapis le pretendu accord de Munster, & qu'on en desire avoir ouverture. Ce qui causera encore du discours.

La Frise a fait memorer, que la dit province desire estre donnée satisfaction au Dennemarc.

MY lords, as far as I can learn, all differing points, as well between Poland and Sweden, as with the allied Imperialists and Brandenburgers, are now concluded and agreed in the cloister Oliva; and to-day, it is believed, the same will be signed. God grant it may be a firm peace! I hope to send over the articles by the next post.

His majesty of Poland, presently after the subscription, intends to return for Poland.

Postscript,

Just now I receive advice, that the peace was not signed to-day, but will be to-morrow, without fail.

Mr.

Mr. J. Aldworth to Secretary Thurloe.

RIGHT HONORABLE,

SINCE my last to yow, dated the $\frac{20}{30}$ March, I have been absent from this place, A.D. 1660. which have been the occasion of my not writing unto yow; but being now returned, and in probability shall reside here for a considerable time, I shall not fayle to give your honour a weekly accompt of what passeth in these parts, according as you desire in your letter, dated the 5th April. The chavalier Paul, commander in chief of the ships of this place, parted here 3 days past only with four ships of war, and three fly-boats, having aboard them about 2500 soldiers: the remaynder being 5 ships of warr, and three flie-boats may follow them in 15 dayes, attending only the arrivall of some soldiers, that are to imbarke on them. The number in all will be about 5000. It is generally supposed, their rendezvous will be at Naples, where is to joyn with them 20 Spanish ships of warr, and a like number of galleys, with about 7000 soldiers; and the pope sends 10 ships, and all his galleyes, with soldiers also. The states of Genoe, and duke of Savoy, furnisheth ships, galleys, and soldiers; so that in all, it's thought, the army may consist of about thirty thousand. The French admirall, with his squadron, carryes the pope's standard and collors, which undoubtedly is only to avoid an avarie, that the grand signeur may say on the French nation. Their designe is either for Candy or Cyprus. It's most probable, their intent is to surprize the latter, whereby to have Turkes sufficient to exchange for the Christians, that are slaves in Turkey. The French squadron hath aboard them three hundred excellent brasse gunns, with provisions for six months; and it is still said, that assoone as the soldiers is landed; the ships goes for West France. The 3 ships, that are building, will not be ready this six monthes, for want of timber, masts, &c. The cardinall Mazarin hath laid such heavy taxes in the people of this province, that they already begin to murmur; and undoubtedly, in a very short time, great disorders will be not only in this province, but in many others, the nation being generally unsatisfyed, especially those of the religion, since the taking of Orange; which is all, that offereth at present, worth your honor's notice; so humbly remayne,

RIGHT HONORABLE,

Your Honor's faithfull servant,

Tollon, the 4. May;

JO. ALDWORTH.

A letter of intelligence.

SIR,

I HAD no letter from you by the last post; but the post before it, I have had one, with an intimation, that you had order from Mr. secretary Thurloe to signify unto me his pleasure and command for to continue here for to write the intelligence to him, which order I shall observe exactly and faithfully. I hope Mr. secretary will be pleased to pay my bill of exchange of fifteene pounds sterling, being but a verie small summe, which I stood in need for to supplye my present necessities. As for newes, since my last to you of the 17th courant, we have by letters from Coppenhagen, of the 14th courrant, that the Suedes have taken prisoner general Schake, and lieutenant-general Alefeld, the two chiefeft commanders of the Danish army, who have done to the king of Denmark the best service in the late warrs against the Suede. They were coming from Funen, in a Hollandish galliot, intending for Coppenhagen, and were mett by the two Suedish men of warre, which tooke this galliot, with the two sayd generalls, and withall, a considerable summe of moneys, above 60,000 rixdollars. The vulgar opinion is, that the Hollander did betray these Danish officers. The Danes can soone change out their two generalls, with some great Suedish officers, which are their prisoners yet, as the prince of Anhalt, the lieutenant-generall Ham, the two counts of Waldeck, the count Conigsmark, and many great ones more. The treatie in Denmark is not yet ended, but it's neare to be concluded. The Danes stick so obstinately to have Balius for their satisfaction, to which the Suedes will not consent, not being expressed in the project of peace, at the Hague, the 4th of August. It's reported but now, that the Suedes will deliver the lands about it to the Dane, but not the castell. The treatie at Ilzehoc, betwixt the Dane and the duke of Holstein, is not yet ended. It's thought it will take no effect; the duke is able enough to hold out the siege of the Danes, before he will stand off from his souverainty of Sleswick, being once agreed to him by the treatie of Rostschild. From Dantzic we have, by

In the possession of the right hon. Philip lord Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain.

A.D. 1660. letters of the 28th currant St. N. that the peace betwixt the Pole and the Suede is certainly concluded; the articells of it are not come out yet; some of them you had in the Dutch printed newes by the last post. The count Conigsmark is now sett at liberty, and is brought from the castle (where he was prisoner) into the towne of Dantziq. The king of Poland is much displeased with the Hollander, and with the city of Danziq. There are great jealousies, discontents, and fears, amongst them. Elbing comes to be delivered to the Brandenburger. This being all at present, I remaine

DE LAWERIN.

For Mr. Isaac Johnson, merchant at London.

I send you herewith inclosed onely one Dutch print of this day; there was none elce printed this day, being the great holy-dayes of Easter, the hand-crafty men being at their devotion.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

I make bold to send your honour my second bill of exchange, and intreats your honour to make good payment to Mr. Richard Basse. I hope your lordship will not take it ill, being a verie small summe for to supplie my present necessities.

DE LAWERIN.

A letter of intelligence.

SIR,

Vol. lxxvii.
p. 384.

MY last to Mr. secretary Thurloe, and to yoursele, inclosed in Mr. Richard Basse his letter, was of the 24th of April. Since your last to me, of the 6th of April, with the order from Mr. secretary Thurloe, I have had none in two posts from you. I must confesse, I am with you at a great uncertainty, sometimes in hopes, sometimes in fear; but I hope, when the next post from England comes on, I shall be at more certainty then, expecting from Mr. secretary Thurloe an answer, if he hath pleased to accept my bill of exchange of fiftene pounds sterling. As for newes, we have by letters from Coppenhagen, of the 29th of April, that the Hollandish fleet hath besett 12 Swedish men of warr, coming from Landskrohn. The Hollander would not let them passe further, nor to returne againe to Landskrohn, but desired them not to stirre from the Hollands fleet, till further order came from the Hollands embassaders; which base action of the Hollanders (if it continue to be true) will be highly resented of the Suedes. It's reported, that the reason of the Hollanders detayning the said Swedish shippis is, that the king of Sueden refuses to keepe the agreement made with the Hollander at Elbing. Others say, that because the Suede domineers upon the seas pro lubito, and hath taken 2000 Danish seamen coming from Norway, and going for Coppenhagen. This newes is come yesterday by severall letters from Coppenhagen, but the Suedish letters from Elfeneur doe not make mention at all of it, but rather, that peace is neare to be concluded. Betwixt the mediators there is of late a great jealousie arisen, which to remove, the Suedish commissioner, seignior Rosenhalm, is gone to Coppenhagen to make them agree together. The French and English embassaders have been hard with words together; they have more yet discovered the Hollanders suttellness; they plague most all nations with their infidelity; the period of their felicity may be neare enough. By letters from Danziq we have, that the peace there is concluded; and nothing more but the ratification to be expected. The Polish parliament is to sitt in the midst of May; I would willingly adde more to this, but at present I have no more of note. Therefore I conclude, and remaine

Hamburg, the 1st of

May, 1660.

Your friend and servant,

DE LAWERIN.

I pray, Sir, impart my letter unto Mr. secretary Thurloe, and let me know his further pleasure, with his owne subscription, if I am to continue here, or not.

The yung Graf Conigsmark had leave from the duke of Brandenburg, with a passe from him, to goe and see his mother at Hamburg, upon parole; and intending to return from hence to Berlin againe, was taken againe upon the Elbe, and is brought prisoner to Gluckstat. How the duke of Brandenburg (whose prisoner it is) will like this folly of the Danes, by the next you shall know it.

Extract

Extract out of the register of the secret resolutions of the H. and M. L. states general of the United Provinces.

Martis, the 4th of May, 1660. [N. S.]

WAS once more produced to this assembly the letter of the four lords extraordinary A.D. 1660. commissioners in Denmark, writ at Copenhagen the 16th of April last, directed to the greffier, containing amongst the rest, in effect, that they had received their H. and M. L. letter of the first of that month, and that they would punctually regulate themselves, according to the contents thereof, also not fail to give this state a further account of their proceedings for the effecting of the contents of the said letter. Whereupon being debated, that notwithstanding the said promise their H. and M. L. have not received any letters from the said lords commissioners by the two last posts, it is therefore resolved, that a letter shall be writ to the said lords commissioners, that their H. and M. L. are highly troubled and displeased at it, the more in regard some lords of the government, and also some particular persons in the Hague, have received letters writ at Copenhagen the 17th of April, that they shall not only advise their H. and M. L. with the reason of their not writing, but also send the account, which they promised, and especially likewise, that they do also advise, why they caused the fleet of this state to withdraw from before Lantscroon, and thereby give occasion to the Swedish ships to turn out, and also suffer several Danish ships to be taken by the Swedes in the sight of the fleet of this state, yea after the declaration of Denmark, which was however judged satisfactory by the ministers of the states. And it is also ordered, that they shall likewise inform this state, how it stands with the treaty of peace between the two northern crowns, to the end, their H. and M. L. may take their measures one way or other, with this addition, that their lordships shall insist upon the orders and commands given in the resolutions of their high and mighty lordships of the 3d of October, 30th of January, and the 19th of April last, and to execute the same punctually, and not recede from any point mentioned in the same.

MONSIEUR,

MA dernière estoit le 1. de se mois à six heures du soir, depuis est party 532 vers 591 p. 388. le jour d'hier à 8 heures du soir; son retour est incertain; mais selon toute apparence il retournera en bref.

Le roy d'Angleterre Breda Angleterre,
530 est encore à 590 avec grande apparence, et sans doute qu'il partira vers 529, en peu de temps. Le 572 est entièrement pour 530, et le dito 530 et 532 en sont très affeuréz.

Il faut avoir une 135 rsonne à 603 pour adresser le toutance le premier. Tout ce que Monsieur Lockhart pardeça advyser lettre, sieur 574 desire de 148 scavoir, il faut l' 174 distinctement. J'envoye icy copie d'une 348, venant de la 593. Toutes les 348 il faut les 201.

Si Lockart Breda tout
150 le sieur 574 desire, j'iray bien à 590 pour l'advertir de 156 un; cependant j'espere de vous bientoist voir, &c.

Substance principale d'une lettre escrete de la Haye le 1. May, 1660.

Depuis nous recevons grande confirmation, que le roy d'Angleterre, qui est presentement à Breda, ira bientoist en Angleterre, de tantque le parlement semble totalement tenir sa partie, ce qui apparoitra en peu des jours hors de leur assemblée. D'Angleterre viennent journellement plusieurs grands personnages, pour congratuler le roy, et presenter leur service, et aussi sont partys à hier d'icy deux deputés des estats generaux, ayant charge de presenter au dit roy toute faveur et assistance; aussi dit on icy, que le gouverneur de Dunquerque est accordé avec les Espagnols, ce que l'on croit icy, parcequ'il est reconnu homme sage et advisé, &c. au moien de quoy Flandres sera en repos, &c.

 can assure you, 55 has intirely ^I 39 18 15 41 38 17 16 5 81 against any, that shall be for 122, or not 21 35 38 6 51 or 49. The like is done in most of 79, and some 78. Soe that whatever does befall 55 or 60, who walke together, 55 does not doubt but their 24 31 40 19 38 17 39 40 2 will not fall; for 90 for the most part is fixed, I meane for 51 or 49. 'Tis true, 75 has note yet 76, nor could it now be done without put-

 30 36 11 31 24 19 39 in 24 40 3 will doe nothings without 55 and 60. I know not what you meane about 85, havinge never yet heard any order touching it. But I can fully assure you of 97, who is in 24 40 2, and all the 22 12 38 24 39 32 31 2 are very 38 25 22 23 40 3. 55 doe monstiously dread 116, and if 49 should be of such, God only knowes what wil be the evils. I am therefore hartily glad, that the 29 34 38 16 39 5, I mean of 48, do resolve to 39 24 40 3; that may be hazardous; but the other
 I doubt is certayne. If Lambert should breed any disturbance, we are reddey here to secure

A letter from Dublin.

I RECEIVED yours of the 10th by Mr. C. and would be glad to hear, that mine are Vol. lxvii.
 come safe to your hands. From Corke 'tis written, that the news of my lord Broghill's P. 376.
 being made lord president of Munster was received with many demonstrations of joy, expressed by bonfires, vollys of great shot from the forts, &c. From Ulster I am informed, that the earl of Antrim, though a papist, has discovered, that the pope did lately send a bishop over hither, who had drawn severall of the Irish to engage under their hands against any of the late king's family. The truth or ground of this you must judge of. The ordinance (as they call it) for the poll-money was yesterday passed, which 'tis thought will amount to towards 200000 l. This day, after some high debate about dissolving or adjourning the convention, it was carryed for adjourning only, which they say is to be for 6 weekes after friday next, at which time the names of persons are to be brought in to sitt as a committee in the interim; yet so that upon any emergency occasion, in the intervall the speaker (who had 300 l. voted him for his good service) is to take the chair, and summon the other members (most of which live or will stay in or about Dublin) to convene again.
 They have condemned Mr. Chambers's book to the fire, and put him out of salary. Five bishops, Rapho, Kilmore, and 3 others, put in, and have 200 l. per ann. apiece.
 No other considerable alteration have happened here since my last of the 18th. I remaine

 out assuring your lordships, that I have a singular affection to your state, and should take

A letter of intelligence from the Hague.

Samedy, le 1. May, 1660. [N. S.]

A.D. 1660. LE sieur Coyet a fait plainte de ce, que le Dennemarc tourmente le duc de Holstein contre le contenu du traité de Roschild, et au reste en suite du memoire de sieur resident de Bye; mais peu de reflection a esté prinse sur cela.

Vol. lxvii.
P. 379.

Il y a eu plainte des marchands, de ce qu'en la cour de grand Muscovite on fait peu de droit à ceux de cest estat. Ils ont requis d'estre donné quelque caractère à tel Tielman Ackema, soy tenant à Moscovie. Ce que la Hollande a overgenomen.

Il y a eu conference à ce matin pour hauffer la depense journalliere des ambassadeurs de 65, à 100, par jours.

Le sieur de Renswoude, mal content de ce, qu'on n'a pas associé son fils aux ambassadeurs, est fasché de cela. Et la Groningue pour ce qu'on ne paye pas les changes restants du sieurs Ibrants, montants à bien vingt mille francs.

La Frise a fait proposer l'affaire de Munster, pour savoir en quel estat, et pour l'assister. On a dit qu'il failloit attendre.

Lundy, le 3. dito.

Il y a eu un memoire de l'ambassadeur de Portugal, faisant plainte de ce, que desja un demy an passé il a bailly memoire, et fait presentation, demandant response et resolution; et qu'il ne reçoit rien: requiert encore expedition.

Ceux du Sas de Gent supplient, qu'une fois soit prinse resolution touchant le Verboemen, ce qui est mis en mains des commissaires.

La ville de Bremen a requis estre enclose dans la paix du North, contre la soustenue de Suede, prétendants, qu'elle est d'autre nature que Lubeck et Hamborgh.

Le Geldre a requis changement de la compagnie de Ehrentrieter hors de Zurphen contre celle de Pinsen.

Le conseil d'estat a fait plainte de ce, que la Hollande depuis l'an 1655 ne paye point d'affignation ou actes de versouck du conseil.

Mardy, le 4. dito.

Les admirautés, ou l'admirauté d'Amsterdam, l'a fait si grossiere en cette derniere revision sur un navire de Lubeck de Luytjen Lomans, que les interessés ont fait plainte icy, allegants que tous les adjoints ont improuvé la sentence, voire ont dit, que c'estoit une Goddeloose sententie; et que c'estoit couper la bourse aux merchants; sur quoy (chose jamais ouyée) les estats generaux ont ordonné, que le cas sera mis es mains du grand conseil, pour en avoir avis. Et le ministre d'Angleterre a grand raison de dire, qu'il n'a que faire de la revision, et qu'il fait bien en tirer raison sans cela. Bref il conste, que la dite admirauté ne fait pas droit tousjours.

Il y a besoigne sur les affaires de Portugal.

Il y a eu trois memoires de l'ambassadeur d'Espagne: les deux sont mis en mains du conseil d'estat; le 3. es mains des deputés sur la marine.

La Geldre a proposée, la Hollande secundée, que c'est chose intolerable, que les deputés extraordinaires de l'estat en Dennemarc n'escrivent rien de ce qu'ils font. Sur quoy leur sera escrite une lettre de reprimende très-serieuse.

Mecredy, le 5. May.

Il y a eu grand bruit sur ce que l'on n'attend rien de la conclusion du traité en Dennemarc, l'on ne pas digerer la prinse de ces notables officiers Danois menés à Malmo. De Hollande comparurent bon nombres de membres dans la generalité, faisant grand bruit, si que la lettre escrite aux deputés selon la conclusion de hier a esté notablement augmentée de passages et parolles très-serieuses, pour taxer les deputés, et les contraindre à rendre conte et raison de diverses prevarications vel quasi, présupposants, que ç'a esté aux deputés de cest estat tous seuls, et comme si ceux de France et d'Angleterre n'y avoient rien à dire.

Le sieur Downing a esté en conference avec ceux de Hollande, et y a fait les mêmes plaintes, qu'il a fait cy-devant par divers memoires aux estats generaux.

Et l'on prendra l'advis, non seulement du grand conseil, mais aussy de la cour provinciale sur le cas hesterne de la revision de la sentence de l'admirauté d'Amsterdam,

La princesse douariere d'Ost-Frise ayant notifié, que le feu prince son mary a requis cest estat pour tuteur sur ses jeunes princesses, la Hollande l'a overgenomen.

Vendredy, le 7. dito.

Le sieur Downing a esté voir le sieur president, et luy a dit de bouche, que passés 3 ou 4 semaines il a fait une proposition, selon laquelle il a recommandée la paix au Nord, qu'il n'a pas encore response; mais qu'il insiste encore pour response; et si on ne lui respond point, qu'il qu'il doit prendre cela pour negative ; et qu'en ce cas tant la France que la Suede font sollicitants d'Angleterre pour faire une ligue et alliance avec l'Angleterre. A.D. 1660.

Mais si cest estat veut faire et tenir bonne alliance avec cest estat, que l'Angleterre ne desirera rien plus volontiers. Sur quoy n'est rien encore fait, si non que les deputés des affaires du Nort sont admonestés de considerer et examiner la susdite proposition. Aucuns disoient, que cela n'estoient que des parolles chaudes du dit sieur Downing.

Lord Broghill to secretary Thurloe.

DEARE SIR,

I HUMBLY thanke you for the favor of your letter, and what was in it. Since the providence of God hath soe ended my lord Lambert's undertaking, 'tis beleev'd it is much better he made that attempt, then if he had not ; for he would still have bin esteemed more formidable to his ennemys, and more considerable to his friends, if this happy experiment had not undeceived both. The one are not a little alarmed here by a strange report brought over this post, as if there should be a close intended with the kinge, only on an act of indemnity, and a few things of that nature. Not that both houses want eminent old patriots, but that such are not the greater number. Wee all hope thos pretious rights we have soe longe, and we thinke justly contended for, will not be exposed, but provided for.

Our generall convention did this day adjorne for 6 weekes. They hope within that time, if things continue quiet in England, we shall have a parliament heere ; if unquiet, then they will be in a better posture to settle England. They past this enclosed declaration. It was first mooved by judge adv. Whaly ; it was drawne up much more sharply then now. 'Twas not to be stopped, when once mooved. If we can finde any way to keepe civil and military affaires on foot, if I should goe for England ere any one of our number come from thence to releve me, I shall not stay a day after ; or if any com to supply my place, I shall hasten thither. The generall here enjoyed me with some earnestnes to use expedition heerein. I confesse I never did longe more to be in a parliament, then I longe to be in this, and that which you mentioned in your inclosed not beinge done, seems to call aloud upon all, that can fit to serve their countrey, to doe it, and keep off one extreme, as well as we have through mercy bin lately freed from another.

The hopes I have ere longe to have the much desired satisfaction of discourfinge fully with you, and the post barque beinge reddey to set sayle, makes me heer only assure you of the reall truth of my beinge,

DEARE SIR,

Your most affectionate and most faithfull humble servant,

Dublin, 2. of May, 60.

BROGHILL.

If honnest Cadwallader be neer you, let him know I am his most humble reall servant.

Captain G. Butler to secretary Thurloe.

SIR,

I HAVE endured much miserye and losse for this state abroad, and att home, yet never had satisfaction. That way I have propounded is so modest and feazible, that I am confident, if you would please but to offerr it to the counsell, it would be granted, I having ingaged my lord generall by generall Pen. Sir, a speedy answeare is all, that is expected ; and if you please not to favour mee in it, expresse your mind to my friend this gentleman captain Bray, that I may apply myself to some other. My necessitys are pressinge, and such as if you were sensible of, would cause you to commiserate him, who is

Your humble servant,

G. BUTLER.

To the right honourable the council of state,

The humble petition of captain Gregory Butler,

Sheweth,

A D. 1660.

Vol. lxvii.
p. 326.

THAT the petitioner served under the right honourable the earl of Essex, Sir William Waller, and major-general Massey, to the latter end of the year 1646, at which time the brigade was disbanded.

That your petitioner was afterwards sent for by the lord protector, and employed as a commissioner into America, in which service he lost his brother the adjutant-general, and six servants, besides 1200 l. in the management and support of the service, and as yet never received his own arrears, or any of his brother's.

Your petitioner humbly prayeth, that you would take the premises into your grave and wise consideration, and allow unto him a commission to call to account all these prize officers in the Caribbee islands of Barbadoes, Antegoe, Mevis, Mount Serrat, and St. Christophers, for all the advantages and benefits they have received for the advantage of the English nation, out of which he may satisfy himself his just arrears due in that service, and be accountable for the remainder; and also to grant unto your said petitioner a commission for the government of Tortugar on the north-west part of Hispaniola, with authority to depute and grant commissions to men of war against any, that shall be enemies to your interest.

And your petitioner, as bound in duty, shall pray:

Lord Broghill to secretary Thurloe.

DEARE SIR,

Dublin, the 8th of May, 60.

Vol. lxvii.
p. 392.

I CONFESS your last favor of the 1st instant did not a little amaze me; soe unanimous and greate a progress made in one day by both houses in soe weighty a business may cause a man to wonder as much as at any thinge has happened in this age, which hath bin nor unfruitfull in admirable productions. I heartily beg of the Lord, that our steps may be as safe as they are expeditious; and that we may ascertayne those just rights by an agreement, which we contended for soe successfully in the warr. I'll assure you, many of us pray hartily for the parliament; and we think we never had more reason to doe soe then now, our whole settlement being now to be concluded on; and what is now done will hardly admitt of the least amendment, tho' we might afterwards discover never soe greate an oversight. I intend, God willinge, as soone as I am releaved heer, to hasten for England. I most humbly thanke you for your forreign newes. I heere send you the words of an address to be sent to the generall. It was unanimously subscribed yesterday. Wee longe to receive our next packet; for by it we expect to see all concluded, if we may judge of subsequent days proceedings by the first; and tho' therein also we may be deceived, yet I am certayne you will never be soe in beleivinge,

DEARE SIR,

Your most affectionate, and most humble servant,

BROGHILL.

King Charles II. to William Morrice esq;

MR. MORRICE,

Breda, 20. May, 1660. [N.S.]

In the possession of Hugh Gregor esq;

THE last weeke Bernard Grenville was even departing from me with my answer to yours of the 20th of the last month, when some messengers arrived with the newes of the reception my letters and declaration founde in the two houses, which made most, that I had writt to you, unnecessary; and so I stopped his journey. I have since received yours of the 5th and I must tell you I find cause enough to rejoyce in the very good opinion I have of you, and in the choice I have made of you for so neere a trust, which I am sure you will discharge with full abilitys, as well as fidelity to me. I shall hereafter write to you with that freedome as is due to such a servante, and imparte those apprehensions to you, you, which it may be you may finde upon further inquiry to be very reasonably grounded. A.D. 1660.

 That both houses are very well constituted of men, who desire to restore the nation to a full peace and security, upon the right and safe foundation of the lawes, I do not in the least degree doubt; yet there is a little question, that there are some persons both within and without both houses, who desire to keep up the memory of old jealousies and animosities, and to prevent such an intire union, as can only make us all happy. Next the blessing of God, nothing can so absolutely disappoint those disguises as my presence with you, which those men will as much endeavour to hasten, being most assured (as I doubt not you are) that I have offered nothing in my declaration or letters, that I will not most punctually and exactly performe; but without doubt, for the speedy and secure way of doing it, my presence is most necessary, which would easily adjust all those things, both in matter and forme, which are lyable to most objections. And therefore I pray looke upon those, who would delay my speedy coming to you, as persons who have other designs than they yet owne. I know the generall cannot but observe, that my frindes in the house have complied with his desires in all thinges, according to the commande I gave them, and have thereupon departed from their own sense, and restrayned themselves from pursuing that, which they thought most for my service. You must take care, that I do not suffer for that temper and condescension in them; and that advantage be not taken from thence, either to delay the dispatch of what is necessary, or to set on foote any unnecessary and inconvenient demandes, which must be inconvenient to me, and would lessen that joy, with which we should meete each other to receive those greates blessings, which God Almighty is ready to powere upon us, if any indisposition in the army makes it lesse fitt for the general to appeare. In pressing that, which is most desirable, you may easily get it to be promoted by the houses, to which he and the army are obliged to submit. Do all, I pray, that is necessary to be done, in order to the bringing me quickly to you; till when, trust me, there are as many designs abroade as at home to prevent and disturbe that good intelligence and agreement, which can only make us happy, and disappoint the many designs, which are against the peace and honour of the nation. I know not what to say more, till the committy arive, who I hope will invite me speedily to repaire to you. Sir J. Grenville will, I am sure, be absent from you, and so I cannot communicate some thinges, which are not so fit to write; and therefore I have intrusted Sir William Compton to imparte some particulars of my doubts and apprehensions to you. He is a person, in whose discretion you may repose greates confidence, as well as in his affection and fidelity to me, and can convey any thing you thinke necessary, and shall advise him, to many of my frindes, who will be very usefull upon all occasions. I will say no more, but that I long to see you, which I hope is at hande, and you will then finde you have a full credit with

Your affectionate frinde,

CHARLES R.

Sir Edward Hyde to William Morrice esq;

SIR,

I HAVE enough understoode from Sir John Greenvill, how much I am beholdinge to you; In the possession of Hugh Gregor esq; and I beseech you do not impute it to vanity in me, that I was alwayes confident, that at some tyme or other, either by the representation of some frend, or when I should be fully knowne to you, I should have a part in your frendshipp. I am afrayde I may be now upon some disadvantage by the so good character the partiality of Sir J. Greenvill may have given me to you, which I may appeare farr shorte of; and I shall be very well contente, that you thinke me not so good a man, as he hath pleased to deliver me, so you thinke me not so ill a man, as others have given me out to be. I hope shortly to wayte on you; for the kinge expects and desires, that you would come with my lord generall to meete him, for till then he will take no resolution of importance; and I shall make myselfe as worthy of your frendship as I can. I have preesumed to write to his excellencie, which, if you thinke fitt, I should desyre you to present to him, as likewise the other letter to Mr. Palmer, if the contents be agreeable to your opinion, which will alwayes finde a great submission from,

SIR,

Your most obedient servant,

Hague, 27. May, S. N. [1660.]

EDW. HYDE.

For my very worthy friend Mr. Morrice.

To the king's most excellent majesty,

The humble petition of the lords and commons in parliament assembled,

Sheweth,

A.D. 1660.
Vol. lxvii.
p. 405.

THAT your majesty having declared your gracious pleasure to proceed only against the immediate murderers of your royal father, we your majesty's most humble subjects (the lords and commons in parliament assembled) not finding Sir Henry Vane or colonel Lambert to be of that number,

Are humble suitors to your majesty, that if they shall be attainted, yet execution as to their lives may be remitted.

And, as in duty bound, we shall ever pray for your majesty's long and happy reign over us.

The said petition, being read, was agreed to, and ordered to be presented to his majesty by the lord chancellor.

The lord chancellor reported, that he had presented the petition of both houses to the king concerning Sir Henry Vane and colonel Lambert; and his majesty grants the desires in the said petition.

JO. BROWNE, clerk of the parliament.

Mr. Thurloe to Sir Harbottle Grimston.

HONOURABLE SIR,

In the possession of the right hon. Philip lord Hardwicke, lord high chancellor of Great Britain.

HEARINGE it reported, that I should, about the tyme of the king's tryall and death, declare to divers officers of the army, that it was the judgment of my lord St. John, that the king ought to be put to death, and that the nation could not be safe without it; and that he the sayd lord St. John was a cheife adviser of Oliver to set up himselfe, and in the managinge of his publike affaires; and that I was the medium or hand betweene them, by which their counsellis were communicated to each other; and further, that the lord St. John had a great hand in setting up Richard, and did alsoe plott and endeavour the restoringe of him after his resignation; and knowinge these reports to be altogether false and groundless, I thought it a duty I owe to the truth, to take notice thereof to you; and the testimony, which I give herein, is that, which I am ready to be deposed upon.

1. And first, as to that of the king's tryall and death, it is utterly untrue, that I declared or spake either to the officers of the army, or any other, that my lord St. John's judgment was for his majesty's tryall or death. I was altogether a stranger to that fact, and to all the counsellis about it, havinge not had the least communication with any person whatsoever therein: and I doe beleve it was very farr from being my lord St. John's judgment, because I heard him speake in dislike of it, and of the proceedings of the army then and longe before that time; and therefore I should have done hym great wronge to have reported that of hym, as they have done me, who have rayfed these reports of me.

2. As to his advisinge the settinge up of Oliver, and counsellinge hym in the manadgment of his affaires by the medium of me, who am supposed to be the instrument, that went betweene them; my lord St. John was soe farre from advisinge him to sett up himselfe, that to the best of my knowledge and observation he was a great enemy to it, and hath often to me spake against it. And as for that called the instrument of government, I never spake with my lord St. John, either about the whole, or any part of it, (nor ever heard that any body else did) untill some months after it was published in print, when goinge to visit hym after a long and dangerous sickness, which he fell into before the instrument was ever spake of before me, he told me, he had just then read our government; and takinge it up in his hands, he cast it from him in great dislike, and sayd, Is this all the fruit the nation shall have of their warre? or words to that purpose; and then tooke occasion to speake much against it. And as he had nothinge to doe in settinge up this government, soe neither was there, soe farre as I knowe or have heard, any communication of counsellis betweene Oliver and him, mediately or ymediately, touchinge the manadgment of any part of the publike affaires, my lord St. John alwayes refusinge to meddle in any thinge, but what concerned his place as a judge; and in that he refused to proceed upon any of the lawes made under that government; for which he was complayned of to the counsell, and it was imputed to his example, that the judges refused to act upon the last high court of justice. Nor was hee (to my knowledge) advised with in the petition and advise. The truth is, that my lord St. John was soe farre from being a confident, that some, who loved and valued him, had something to doe to preserve him under that government.

3. As

3. As to the setting up Richard, or endeavouring to restore him againe after his A.D. 1660. resignation, I have never heard, nor doe I beleieve, that my lord St. John knew any thinge at all about his being made successor, nor that he did ever advise with Oliver, or any other person whatsoever touchinge the succession; nor doe I knowe or beleieve, that he ever designed, endeavoured, or indeed wisht his restoration, because I have often heard hym expresse his judgment to be against it; and I beleieve would in his station have opposed it. I humbly take leave to signe myself

Your most humble, and most obedient servant,

J. T.

To the right honourable Sir Harbottle Grimston, speaker of the house of commons.

Mr. Thurloe to the lord chancellor Hyde.

May it please your LORDSHIP,

SOME few dayes before my retirement I had notice given me of a very neare alliance and Vol. lxvii. confederacy then in projection betweene the French kinge and the states general, and had p. 406. a copy of the project itselſe sent to me, which (upon a late review thereof) I conceived it my duty to communicate to your lordship.

I have not sent the articles themselves, beinge very large, havinge regard to you other great and weighty affaires, much less have I presumed to set downe any observations of my owne upon this great; . . . but have drawne out the substance of the articles into the heads conteyned in this paper, which doe shew the scope and designe of the framers of this alliance, and the great reference it hath both in honour and interest to his majestye and this kingdome. Perhaps your lordshipp may have had this account from other hands. However, I hope your lordshipp will pardon me for doing that, which I thought my duty did oblige me to.

3. As to the setting up Richard, or endeavouring to restore him again after his A.D. 1660. resignation, I have never heard, nor do I believe, that my lord St. John knew any thing at all about his being made successor, nor that he did ever advise with Oliver, or any other person whatsoever touching the succession; nor do I know or believe, that he ever designed, endeavoured, or indeed with his restoration, because I have often heard him express his judgment to be against it; and I believe would in his station have opposed it. I humbly take leave to sign myself,

Your most humble, and most obedient servant,

To the right honorable Sir Harbottle Grimston, Speaker of the house of commons.

Mr. Thurloe to the lord chancellor Hyde:

May it please your Lordship,

SOME few days before my retirement I had notice given me of a very near alliance and Vol. LXII. consideration then in projection between the French king and the States general, and had a copy of the project itself sent to me, which (upon a late review thereof) I conceived it my duty to communicate to your Lordship. I have not sent the articles themselves, being very large, having regard to you other great and weighty affairs, much less have I presumed to set down any observations of my own upon this great; . . . but have drawn out the substance of the articles into the hands conveyed in this paper, which does show the scope and design of the framers of this alliance, and the great reference it hath both in honour and interest to his majesty and this kingdom. Perhaps your Lordship may have had this account from other hands. I follow, I hope your Lordship will pardon me for doing that, which I thought my duty did oblige me to.
